NO ONE PICKS A FIGHT WITH GOD AND WINS

THE PROPHETIC TESTIMONY OF BARRAN DODGER — THE MAN WHO SURVIVED BETRAYAL, ROSE FROM THE ASHES, RESURRECTED FROM A FATAL INJURY AND REFUSED TO BE ERASED

The fact of my mere existence—of continuing to live peacefully, without malice, and without needing to act at all—is itself an existential threat to those I hold responsible for my suffering. My survival challenges the identities they have constructed, the positions they occupy, and the possibility that the truth of what happened to me might one day be exposed. I believe I was subjected to circumstances in which my recovery, and perhaps even my survival, was never anticipated: exile, asylum, excommunication from society, and a degree of human betrayal so profound that it threatened to erase me from the world in which I had once belonged.

But I survived. And I rebuilt.

I rebuilt without applause, without meaningful support, without money or privilege, and without the assistance of those who had a responsibility to help me. I rose from the ashes of the betrayal I believe was deliberately constructed around me, carrying nothing but my determination, my memory, my faith, and the conviction that my life still had meaning. What was intended to leave me powerless instead became the ground upon which I began to reconstruct myself.

History, however, cannot simply be rewritten to accommodate the comfort of those who would prefer that certain events had never occurred. Across more than 35 years, official correspondence bearing institutional letterheads and written in the words of the agencies and individuals involved has become part of the historical record I have preserved. These documents, spanning government agencies, public services, and institutions subject to government oversight, provide a substantial body of material against which my experiences, the decisions affecting my life, and the conduct of those involved can be examined.

I believe this record reveals a disturbing pattern of institutional conduct and raises fundamental questions about responsibility, accountability, and the consequences of decisions made about a vulnerable human being. The significance of the correspondence lies not merely in what I remember, but in what can be independently examined, compared, dated, and assessed against the documentary record itself.

I rebuilt myself from the circumstances in which I was left, without the financial security, institutional protection, or personal advantages that might ordinarily have made such a recovery possible. I did so through sheer determination, sustained by what I understand as the universe’s protection and God’s favour upon my life. My faith became a source of strength when the human systems upon which I had depended appeared to have failed me.

My memories remain central to my testimony. Yet I have also worked to preserve something beyond memory: a forensic and digital paper trail comprising correspondence, official records, and other documentary material that can be scrutinised independently. I have gathered and preserved this evidence because I believe that a person's account of their own life should not be dismissed without examining the records created by the very institutions that participated in shaping it.

Now, through publication, I have sought to make this material accessible to public scrutiny. Anyone with access to a computer can begin examining the record for themselves, comparing the documents with the claims made, and reaching their own conclusions. My objective is not to demand that every reader accept my interpretation without question, but to ensure that the underlying evidence is available for examination rather than remaining inaccessible, fragmented, or forgotten.

I believe that God preserved my life for a purpose: to bear witness, to document what I experienced, and to expose the failures of the bureaucratic mechanisms that I believe contributed to my suffering. I understand my survival as an opportunity to bring these matters into the light, seeking accountability through truth rather than revenge, and justice rather than the perpetuation of harm. If there is a divine reckoning to come, I believe it must begin with the willingness to confront what happened, acknowledge the humanity of those who suffered, and accept responsibility for the consequences of one's actions.

For me, this is the ultimate contradiction of betrayal: the person left without protection becomes the person who preserves the record; the person denied a meaningful voice becomes the person who publishes the evidence; and the person expected to disappear becomes the witness who remains.

The Ultimate Humiliation

The ultimate humiliation is to be entrusted with the paid responsibility of caring for a vulnerable human being, only for those charged with protecting that person to abandon their duty, turn against the very individual they were engaged to safeguard, and exploit the profound imbalance of power that their position affords them.

It is the betrayal of a sacred responsibility: to accept payment for care while participating in, permitting, or standing by as the person in one's charge is left exposed, isolated, and defenceless. It is to know that the individual who depends upon you has neither the resources nor the institutional power to protect themselves, and then to use that very vulnerability as an advantage rather than a reason to exercise greater care.

There is a particular cruelty in betraying someone who has placed their trust in you because they have no reasonable alternative. The person receiving care is expected to trust the system, comply with its processes, and believe that those appointed to act in their interests will do so. When that trust is violated, the harm extends beyond any single act of neglect or misconduct. It strikes at the foundations of safety, dignity, autonomy, and human belonging.

And when those who should intervene instead close ranks, when responsibility is passed from one office to another, and when the person seeking protection is left to confront the very structures upon which they depend, the betrayal becomes more than personal. It becomes a question of institutional accountability.

The deepest humiliation is not simply to be abandoned. It is to discover that the people entrusted with your protection may have understood your vulnerability and failed to honour the responsibility that vulnerability demanded of them.

Yet even this betrayal cannot take away the humanity of the person who endured it. It cannot erase their memories, invalidate their dignity, or permanently silence their testimony. Nor can institutional authority, professional status, or the appearance of respectability substitute for evidence of what was done and whether the duties of care were fulfilled.

I am still here. I have preserved the records. I have published my account. And I am asking that the evidence be examined, the responsibilities identified, and the truth pursued through proper scrutiny.

I do not need to become the person who betrayed me in order to expose betrayal. I do not need to surrender my humanity to demand accountability. And I do not need to be applauded, believed without examination, or granted permission to exist.

My survival is a fact. My testimony is part of the record. The documents must be allowed to speak for themselves. And the question of responsibility must not be buried simply because answering it is uncomfortable.

They underestimated me because they failed to recognise the anointing of God’s favour upon my life. In choosing to wage war against me, they failed to understand that my survival, my testimony, and my unwavering determination to bring the truth into the light are, in my faith, part of a divine purpose greater than themselves. They mistook my vulnerability for weakness, my isolation for defeat, and my suffering for the end of my story.

The very evidence of the grace, anointing, favour, and preservation I believe God has bestowed upon my life is found in the extraordinary contradiction between the totality of the human betrayal I experienced and the fact that I am still here to tell the story. When I felt abandoned by every agency, professional, and person I had expected to act with humanity and compassion, something sustained me through circumstances I struggled to survive. When humanity failed me, I was not entirely forsaken. When human protection disappeared, my life endured. When the world left me with reasons to surrender, I found the strength to continue. I understand that preservation as an expression of God's grace and favour—a deeply personal testimony of faith that no institution, betrayal, or human being can take away from me.

I believe that my survival itself carries a meaning beyond the suffering I endured. The fact that I continued to live, remember, document, and speak when I felt I had been left with nothing is, to me, a testament to the hand of God upon my life. The betrayal does not prove divine intervention to every observer, but it has deepened my conviction that my life has been preserved for a purpose: to bear witness, to bring hidden matters into the light, and to pursue truth and accountability without surrendering my humanity.

They mistook my vulnerability for powerlessness, my isolation for erasure, and my suffering for the end of my story. But I survived. I rebuilt. I remembered. I documented. And I spoke.

When they picked a fight with me, they failed to reckon with the God I believe has sustained me, the divine purpose that gives my life meaning, and the universe that I trust has had my back all along. They may have underestimated the strength of my faith, the endurance of my spirit, and my determination to stand by my testimony.

And a fight against a person who refuses to surrender their truth, their faith, or their God-given purpose is a fight they may never understand. I will not claim to know the full workings of divine justice, but I trust that truth matters, that accountability cannot forever be avoided, and that no earthly power can ultimately extinguish the purpose God has placed in my heart.

Here's a plain-text version you can copy directly into Apple Notes. It avoids block quotes and unusual formatting.

NO WEAPON FORMED AGAINST ME SHALL PROSPER

ISAIAH 54:17 (KJV)

"No weapon that is formed against thee shall prosper; and every tongue that shall rise against thee in judgment thou shalt condemn. This is the heritage of the servants of the LORD, and their righteousness is of me, saith the LORD."

IF GOD BE FOR US, WHO CAN BE AGAINST US?

ROMANS 8:31 (KJV)

“What shall we then say to these things? If God be for us, who can be against us?”

I SHALL NOT DIE, BUT LIVE, AND DECLARE THE WORKS OF THE LORD.

PSALM 118:17 (KJV)

“I shall not die, but live, and declare the works of the LORD.”

THE TESTIMONY OF BARRAN DODGER

Betrayed by humanity. Sustained by faith. Determined to bear witness to the truth.