IMPORTANT STATUS AND SCOPE

This is a newly structured forensic narrative, not a reproduction of the three source PDFs. It reorganises the material into a connected account, identifies the documentary propositions that can presently be supported, and sets out the questions that require examination of the underlying records. It is Draft 01 because the full underlying archive has not yet been ingested and authenticated document by document.

The materials directly examined for this draft are: (1) “The Government Record — Itemised Agency Documents | Barran Dodger”, a 24-page register identifying 657 entries grouped under 24 agencies and services; (2) “Every Minister Must Now Resign”, a 14-page accountability appeal; and (3) “The 35-Year Testimony”, an 18-page personal and documentary testimony. The Government Record states that entries include letters, decisions, refusals, notices, replies issued on agency letterhead, and correspondence sent to agencies and preserved in the archive. Accordingly, the 657 entries are not all necessarily government-authored decisions. They include material of different authorship and evidentiary character.

The public repository page for wezzo72/Barrandodger is accessible as a public listing. Its visible directory view is truncated at 1,000 entries and reports 1,337 commits; the repository README excerpt states that a 4 October 2026 recount identified 5,583 files, including 2,840 PDFs and 1,813 HTML files. Those repository-level figures are statements displayed in the repository and have not been independently recounted in this draft. The three supplied PDFs do not include all those underlying files. A complete forensic examination of every original document therefore remains outstanding.

This report uses four evidentiary labels. "Recorded in the supplied source" means the proposition appears in one of the supplied PDFs or the visible repository material. "Reported by the author" means it is the author's account or allegation and has not been independently established here. "Analytical inference" means a possible pattern or implication arising from the juxtaposition of records, which requires testing. "Unverified / requires original record" means the original document, metadata, full context, or independent corroboration has not yet been examined. These labels are not rhetorical qualifications; they are essential safeguards against overstating what the archive proves.

No conclusion in this report should be read as a judicial finding, criminal determination, or independent confirmation of wrongdoing by a named person. The purpose is to define the evidence, reconstruct the sequence, expose questions that remain unanswered, and specify what a genuinely independent examination should obtain and decide.

1. THE DEMAND: EVERY MINISTER MUST RESIGN — OR ACKNOWLEDGE AND INVESTIGATE

The demand is direct: every minister whose portfolio, decisions, oversight responsibilities or institutional systems are materially implicated must publicly acknowledge the documentary record and ensure an independent investigation. Where that investigation establishes serious misconduct, abuse of office, complicity, retaliation, unlawful decision-making or a grave failure of ministerial responsibility, resignation and any other appropriate consequence should follow. Resignation is not asserted here as a substitute for proof. It is the proposed consequence where responsibility is established.

The central democratic question is not whether one citizen's interpretation of events must automatically be accepted. It is whether a citizen who has accumulated a large documentary record across public institutions can obtain a reasoned, independent examination of the underlying evidence, rather than being passed from one administrative doorway to another without a determination of the substance. The ministerial appeal itself recognises the necessary distinction between ministerial responsibility, institutional accountability and individual criminal liability. Those questions must be kept separate.

The record raises a testable proposition: over a prolonged period, the author made submissions, complaints, requests for records and demands for protection to numerous agencies; the archive records acknowledgements, decisions, referrals, jurisdictional responses, information-access processes and other administrative outcomes; and the author says that the underlying issues remained unresolved while the practical consequences for his life accumulated. If the original records substantiate that sequence, the result may disclose serious weaknesses in complaint-handling, coordination, safeguarding, procedural fairness or oversight. Whether it also establishes deliberate coordination, retaliation or corruption is a separate question requiring evidence of knowledge, conduct, communication, purpose and causation.

The demand for accountability is therefore not that every institution be presumed guilty. It is that no institution be permitted to treat the existence of another agency, another complaint number or another referral as a complete answer to an issue that remains within its own responsibility. A referral is not an investigation; an acknowledgement is not a finding; a jurisdictional closure is not a substantive answer to facts that were never examined.

2. THE PERSON, THE TESTIMONY AND THE ARCHIVE

The supplied testimony identifies its author as Dr Richard William McLean, publicly known as Dr Barran Dodger. The ministerial appeal uses the public-facing name Barran Resonance Dodger and describes him as a disabled Australian citizen, whistleblower, researcher, author and advocate. The materials refer to academic work, published writing, a documentary project, and a history of attempts to obtain institutional responses. Those biographical matters should be verified against primary records where they are material; they are not substitutes for examination of the government correspondence.

The testimony explains why the author began preserving records: he says that his life and dealings with institutions were repeatedly reduced to separate case files, psychiatric descriptions, accommodation matters, financial-management decisions and complaint references. His archive is an attempt to place those fragmented records into a single chronology so that the cumulative effects and the institutional sequence can be examined. The archive's value lies not in the force of its labels but in whether a reader can move from a proposition to the dated source document, identify its author, understand its context, and test the interpretation against the full record.

The author describes the cumulative experience using terms such as "administrative annihilation", "civil erasure", "social death", "political exile", "institutional mobbing", "character assassination", "financial exploitation" and "neglect and abandonment". These are the author's characterisations of the consequences he reports. The forensic task is to translate each characterisation into observable events: a decision, a loss of income, a restriction, a refusal, a discharge, a change in accommodation, a denial of access, a recorded threat, an unanswered request, or a failure to provide a service. The concepts can then be assessed against those events rather than treated as self-proving conclusions.

The testimony expressly cautions that the existence of a letter does not prove every allegation. That qualification should govern the entire master document. At the same time, an official record should not be dismissed merely because it appears in a complainant's archive. The proper method is to authenticate it, obtain the complete record where possible, identify the decision-maker and legal or administrative basis, and assess what the document does and does not establish.

3. THE SCALE AND COMPOSITION OF THE DOCUMENTARY RECORD

The Government Record is presented as "657 official documents from 24 agencies and services". Its opening explanation says that each item is a letter, decision, refusal, notice or reply issued on an agency's letterhead, or correspondence sent to an agency and preserved in the archive. It says that the titles are shown as named in the archive and that dates are taken from file names where present. That description is important because it tells the reader both the breadth and the limitation of the index: it is a finding aid to an underlying collection, not a substitute for reading every source item.

The 24 groupings and their listed counts are: NDIS / NDIA (122); Commonwealth Ombudsman (80); NCAT / VCAT / Tribunals (58); ASIC / APRA / AFCA / ATO (41); Police (AFP / NSW / Victoria) (41); Freedom of Information (39); Housing / Disability Services (36); Comcare / WorkCover / Workers Compensation (33); Prime Minister and Cabinet / Ministers / MPs (31); Health / Hospitals / Mental Health (27); AAT / ART Tribunal (20); Attorney-General (19); OAIC (19); Business.gov / ABN (17); Federal / Federal Circuit Court (13); NSW Trustee & Guardian / Public Guardian (12); Legal Aid (10); Victorian Ombudsman (10); Centrelink / Services Australia (7); Human Rights Commission (6); NSW Ombudsman (5); Victims of Crime (5); NACC (4); and IGIS / ASIO (2).

These are the register's classifications, not an independent audit of each institution's legal responsibility.

The distribution shows that the NDIS / NDIA and Commonwealth Ombudsman categories are the largest, followed by tribunals and a combined financial-regulatory category. This is a useful map of where the author's documentary dealings are concentrated. It does not, by itself, establish that any agency acted improperly. Nor does the number of entries measure the seriousness, validity or outcome of a complaint. Repeated copies, follow-up emails, attachments and undated records may all contribute to the count. The forensic process must deduplicate the collection while preserving every version and its provenance.

The register is described as spanning 35 years. The dated entries visible in the supplied index include substantial activity from 2020 through 2026, including a sequence beginning with 2020 NDIS-related records and extending through September 2026. The testimony describes a 35-year personal history, but the precise chronology of that full period cannot be reconstructed from the visible register alone. Earlier events must be tied to contemporaneous documents, not inferred from the age of the author's overall account.

4. CHRONOLOGICAL RECONSTRUCTION: 2020–2022 — THE EARLY ADMINISTRATIVE AND OVERSIGHT TRAIL

The earliest dated NDIS entries visible in the register include a 21 September 2020 NDIS report and a series of 2021 records concerning provider registration, WorkCover / Comcare classification, NDIS-related payments and the relationship between the NDIS and workplace-injury systems. The register lists records dated 5, 7, 13, 17 and 20 May 2021, followed by a 3 June 2021 NDIS Quality and Safeguards Commission item described as "not an employee". The file titles suggest that the author was attempting to resolve questions about employment status, coverage, provider registration and which body had responsibility. Because the underlying letters have not been read in full, the titles cannot establish what each agency decided or the accuracy of the author's interpretation.

The wider register identifies 2021 records involving the Human Rights Commission, OAIC, Victorian Ombudsman, NDIS, police and other agencies. Among the named items are an AHRC submission dated 6 April 2021; OAIC material dated 1 and 3 November 2021; a 3 November 2021 email said in its filename to have been sent to 35 agencies; a Commonwealth Ombudsman complaint dated 15 November 2021; and an IBAC public-interest disclosure rejection dated 18 November 2021. These entries form a significant early cluster for forensic review. They should be examined in chronological sequence to establish precisely what was disclosed, which bodies received it, what statutory or administrative pathway was invoked, and whether the response addressed the substance or only the allocation of jurisdiction.

The 15 November 2021 Commonwealth Ombudsman complaint is especially important because it is a named complaint with a reference number in the register. The register also lists later Commonwealth Ombudsman items in January, September and October 2022, including material concerning PID references and a complaint outcome. The critical comparison is between the original complaint, any acknowledgement, the agency's stated scope of review, the actual enquiries made, any reasons for declining or closing the matter, and the later correspondence. A refusal may be lawful and properly reasoned; it may also leave a distinct issue unexamined. Only the complete chain can distinguish those possibilities.

The register lists a 14 June 2022 Victorian Ombudsman FOI exemption / s 29A item, an OAIC decision dated 22 April 2022 under reference RQ22-01369, and a 5 October 2022 VOCAT / Ombudsman complaint-rejection item. The file title concerning the OAIC decision refers to a search returning 1,178 results but "no documents identified as relevant". That title is not enough to determine the search methodology, the terms used, the scope of the request or the legal basis for the decision. The original FOI request, search schedule, decision letter and review rights are necessary to test whether the search was reasonable and whether the result was accurately explained.

The early period therefore establishes an important research question rather than a final finding: did multiple bodies receive overlapping complaints and repeatedly direct the author elsewhere, or were they dealing with distinct matters under different statutory functions? The answer requires a cross-reference of complaint numbers, dates, recipients, issues raised, jurisdictional provisions and actual investigative steps. Similar wording across letters may be significant, but it may also reflect standard templates. Any claim of coordination must be supported by evidence of communication, common direction or shared decision-making—not merely by similar administrative language.

5. 2023 — PUBLIC-INTEREST DISCLOSURE, FEDERAL COURT CORRESPONDENCE AND HUMAN RIGHTS CONTACT

The register identifies a 27 March 2023 Federal Court public-interest disclosure assessment, correspondence to the Federal Court in March 2023, and later material concerning a 2023 disclosure referred to as "Krypton". It also lists an NDIS response dated 30 June 2023, an NACC statement dated 3 July 2023 in the testimony's chronology, and several AHRC contacts dated 4 July 2023. The testimony specifically identifies the 27 March 2023 Federal Court PID assessment as a key document. These records should be treated as a connected sequence only after the original documents establish whether they concern the same disclosure, the same alleged conduct, or separate issues.

The 2023 sequence is central because it may show how the author attempted to invoke formal disclosure and oversight pathways. The Federal Court assessment must be read for its precise conclusion, the material considered, the statutory test applied, the role of the Court or its officers, and whether it made findings about the truth of the underlying allegations or only about allocation, jurisdiction or eligibility. The same distinction applies to the NDIS response and NACC correspondence. A decision not to allocate or investigate a disclosure is not necessarily a finding that the disclosed conduct did not occur; equally, it is not proof that the disclosure was substantiated.

The testimony says that a 27 March 2023 PID assessment and the later agency correspondence are part of the institutional record. It also identifies a 30 June 2023 NDIS response and AHRC contacts on 4 July 2023. A full forensic chapter should place the original disclosure, supporting exhibits, receipt confirmations, assessment, any referral, and subsequent review requests side by side. The key questions are whether the decision-maker accurately characterised the disclosure, whether the relevant evidence was considered, whether reasons were given, and whether the author was informed of any available review or alternative pathway.

A separate NDIS decision dated 1 June 2023 is listed as a decline of Supported Independent Living (SIL). The register includes two similarly titled copies. The later s 100 appeal dated 22 January 2024 appears to be part of the subsequent challenge. The original 1 June decision, reasons, assessment evidence, review application, appeal grounds and eventual outcome are essential to determine what support was requested, what was declined, why it was declined, and whether later decisions changed the position.

6. 2024 — SUPPORT PLANS, REVIEW RIGHTS AND THE SCOTT TREADWELL CORRESPONDENCE

The register records a 15 March 2024 Interim Behaviour Support Plan, a 14 February 2024 plan approval item, and a 22 January 2024 s 100 NDIS appeal. It also lists correspondence dated 7 and 8 January 2024 to the NDIS Chief Executive and Scott Treadwell, and multiple file versions associated with the Federal Court, superannuation and the NDIS. The 35-Year Testimony identifies the 15 March 2024 plan and the Scott Treadwell correspondence as important records. These documents may illuminate the interaction between disability supports, work or employment classification, superannuation and the author's complaint that different systems treated his status inconsistently.

The author has placed particular emphasis on Scott Treadwell's observations in Federal Court-related correspondence. The source register and testimony identify the correspondence, but the underlying letter must be read before attributing exact observations or conclusions to its author. A careful report should quote the three points only after checking the original wording, context and qualifications. It must also distinguish an observation by a court officer or employee from a judicial determination, an admission of liability, or a finding that the author's wider allegations are true. The letter may be important evidence, but its legal significance depends on what it actually says and the capacity in which it was written.

The 16 October 2024 NSW Trustee & Guardian section 122 document is identified in the testimony and register. It should be read with the guardianship or financial-management application, appointment records, statutory authority, notices, reasons, review rights and any later correspondence. The forensic question is not simply whether an instrument exists, but what powers it conferred, what matters it authorised, what safeguards applied, how the author's wishes were considered and whether decisions were made within the scope of the authority.

The chronology should also identify the author's reported health and support circumstances during this period, while avoiding the assumption that a behaviour support plan proves a particular diagnosis or validates any disputed allegation. Clinical, disability-support and administrative records serve different purposes. Their conclusions should not be conflated.

7. 2025 — VEHICLE DISPOSAL, HOSPITAL RECORDS, NDIS PLAN APPROVAL AND SAFEGUARDING

The year 2025 contains several records that the testimony identifies as central to the loss of independence and the author's later circumstances. These include the NSW Trustee vehicle disposal decision dated 14 November 2025; a 20 November 2025 NDIS Plan Approval; and Anglicare safety-assessment and duty-of-care material dated 1 December 2025. The register also lists Goulburn Hospital CEO briefing material dated 11 and 14 November 2025, and other health and complaint records. The sequence should be reconstructed with exact dates, decision-makers, reasons and consequences rather than described in broad terms.

The vehicle is described by the author as more than an asset: it represented mobility, a degree of independence and, during a period of homelessness, a means of shelter. Crystal, the author's dog, is described as central to his daily life and wellbeing. The 14 November 2025 disposal decision therefore requires examination of the legal authority relied upon, the author's wishes, the vehicle's ownership and valuation, any consultation, the alternatives considered, the financial treatment of proceeds, the effect on mobility and accommodation, and any plan to mitigate foreseeable harm. The author's account of the impact is evidence of his experience; the decision and supporting records are needed to establish the administrative process and its consequences.

The 20 November 2025 NDIS Plan Approval is a potentially important counterpoint to any general assertion that the NDIS provided no support. It establishes, at the index level, that a plan approval document exists. It does not by itself establish the plan's dollar value, the categories funded, whether the supports were reasonable and necessary, whether providers were available, whether funds were accessible, or whether the approved plan met the author's actual accommodation and safeguarding needs. The plan, budget schedules, implementation correspondence, service agreements, invoices and utilisation records must be compared.

The Goulburn Hospital CEO briefing records and the author's account of hospitalisation and discharge should be assessed together. The testimony reports an extended period at Goulburn Base Hospital, leaving hospital with only one night's accommodation, and subsequently becoming homeless. It also reports a serious medical event in 2021 and an acquired brain injury. These are significant claims requiring the complete hospital file: admission and discharge summaries, clinical notes, observations, investigations, incident reports, discharge planning, referrals, accommodation discussions and any complaint response. The register's existence of a CEO briefing is a lead to a record, not proof of the events described in the testimony.

The 1 December 2025 Anglicare safety assessment and duty-of-care document should be read against the author's stated safety concerns and the accommodation arrangements then in place. The central forensic questions are what risks were identified, who was responsible for acting, what steps were recommended, whether the steps were implemented, and whether the author was consulted. Any gap between a recorded risk and a subsequent action should be established from the complete record and not inferred from the title alone.

8. 2026 — ACCOMMODATION, SAFETY, BANKING, OVERSIGHT AND THE CONTINUING COMPLAINT TRAIL

The register and testimony identify a dense group of records dated 20 January 2026. These include an accommodation request concerning SIL and SDA, an emergency safety assessment, a formal notice concerning alleged NDIS service failure, a police-matter legal documents file, an IGIS / ASIO request for information, an OAIC / FOI / PID-related file, a Commonwealth Ombudsman service-restriction document, and a PID acknowledgement receipt. There are also records dated 21 and 24 January 2026 concerning a ministerial notice, the Attorney-General, OAIC, business-register matters and correspondence to multiple agencies. This cluster requires careful version control because several documents may be submissions drafted by the author rather than agency decisions.

The testimony reports concerns about accommodation, personal safety, support coordination, the ability to leave a provider setting, and whether complaints were adequately addressed. It names Able Point and particular personnel and asks that accommodation agreements, service agreements, consent records, support plans, case notes, incident reports, risk assessments, complaint responses, staff communications and records of requests to leave be preserved. These are specific and auditable requests. The existence of a complaint is not proof of provider misconduct; equally, the provider's own service records are relevant evidence and should be preserved so the account can be checked against contemporaneous entries.

The author reports a threat-to-kill matter and says that a person was arrested and proceedings were listed before Wyong Court. The supplied testimony itself says the current court status and charge details should be confirmed from the official court record. That qualification is essential. The forensic report must obtain the police event number, original report, risk assessment, communications, charge sheet if any, court listing and final outcome. It should not describe an arrest, charge or allegation as a conviction or judicial finding unless the official record establishes that status.

The testimony also reports loss of access to Commonwealth Bank online banking and the mobile application, and asks who requested and authorised any restriction, when it occurred, what authority was relied upon, what notice was given and what alternatives were made available. The author states that Centrelink income was $1,371.27 per fortnight and listed outgoings were $1,369.96, leaving an apparent $1.31. That is the arithmetic presented in the testimony; the underlying income and expenditure schedules, payment dates, deductions, allowances and bank statements must be obtained before treating it as a verified budget position. The immediate humanitarian question is whether the author had practical access to food, medication, transport, communications and essential services while the arrangements were in place.

The register lists NSW Ombudsman correspondence dated 16 September 2026, NDIS Commission acknowledgement material dated 18 September 2026, and a Victorian Ombudsman complainant information sheet dated 19 September 2026. These entries show that correspondence and complaint activity continued into September 2026. An acknowledgement confirms receipt, not investigation or outcome. The complete correspondence must be reviewed to establish whether the matters were allocated, what scope was accepted, what information was requested, what steps were taken and whether a substantive decision followed.

The testimony's chronology also identifies a Commonwealth Ombudsman service restriction document dated 20 January 2026. The legal and procedural basis for that restriction must be read from the original. A service restriction may be based on a statutory or administrative power and may have a stated duration, review mechanism and reasons. The report should not call it retaliation without evidence of motive and causal connection. It should, however, examine whether the restriction was proportionate, properly notified, reviewable and compatible with the need to deal with any urgent safeguarding issue.

9. THE RECURRING ADMINISTRATIVE PATTERN: WHAT CAN BE TESTED

The ministerial appeal describes a recurring cycle: submission of documentary evidence; administrative acknowledgement; referral to another agency; rejection or limitation of complaint scope; failure to examine the underlying allegations; further correspondence; and continued absence of an effective remedy. The 35-Year Testimony similarly states that the author's central grievance is the repeated receipt of referrals, administrative closures, silence or responses that do not address the substance of what he raised. This is the core analytical proposition of the archive.

To test the proposition, every complaint or disclosure must be coded by issue and outcome. The minimum fields are: date submitted; sender; recipient; reference number; alleged conduct; requested remedy; documents supplied; receipt acknowledged; legal or administrative basis invoked; scope accepted; enquiries actually undertaken; evidence considered; decision-maker; reasons; referral destination; review rights; final outcome; and whether the underlying issue was resolved. The same issue should then be followed across institutions. A referral should be counted as a referral, not as an investigation. A closure should be recorded with its stated basis, not automatically described as proof that no investigation occurred.

A pattern of similar outcomes may be evidence of a systemic problem even where there is no evidence of a coordinated conspiracy. Fragmented jurisdiction, rigid eligibility rules, poor record transfer, repeated requests for the same information, inadequate reasons or failure to identify a lead agency can produce a harmful cycle without central direction. Conversely, evidence of shared instructions, undisclosed communications, common decision-making, inconsistent explanations or retaliatory treatment may support a more serious inference. The forensic report must test both possibilities and actively seek evidence that could disconfirm the author's preferred explanation.

The strongest formulation supported at this stage is therefore: the archive contains a substantial, multi-agency documentary trail and the author reports that repeated administrative responses have not produced an effective remedy; the pattern warrants independent reconstruction and assessment. The stronger conclusion—that agencies deliberately coordinated to cause detriment—cannot responsibly be stated as established on the present materials alone.

10. THE MOST SERIOUS ALLEGATIONS: A SEPARATE EVIDENCE PROTOCOL

The source documents contain allegations of coordinated targeting, fabricated or misleading allegations, surveillance, entrapment, reputational damage, attempted assassination or homicide, concealment and involvement by named public figures or other individuals. These are grave allegations. Their gravity makes disciplined evidence handling more important, not less. They should be set out in a separate schedule so that they do not become conflated with the independently verifiable administrative decisions and correspondence.

For each allegation, the investigator should record the precise event alleged; the author's first account and date; the identity of any alleged actor; the contemporaneous evidence; independent witnesses; recordings and original metadata; medical or police records; alternative explanations; contradictory evidence; and the exact finding that can properly be made. For surveillance allegations, for example, the existence of a patent, a technical capability, an unusual experience or a perceived pattern does not prove that a device was deployed against the author. For an alleged attempt on life, the relevant evidence would include contemporaneous clinical records, toxicology where applicable, emergency-service records, incident reports, witness evidence and independent medical opinion.

The testimony refers to Tony Ridley, Steve Ison, Bill Shorten and other individuals. It describes recollections, beliefs and allegations concerning relationships, surveillance, entrapment and political or institutional involvement. The present report does not find those allegations proven. It identifies them as matters the author wants examined and specifies the types of evidence needed. Naming a person in a complaint or file title is not proof of that person's involvement. Any publication of allegations about identifiable individuals must preserve this distinction and avoid presenting suspicion as established fact.

The author's reported psychiatric history and hospitalisations must also be handled carefully. A psychiatric diagnosis does not establish that a complaint is false; neither does it establish that the complaint is true. Clinical records should be examined for their actual observations, differential diagnoses, dates, treatment decisions and stated basis. The report should not use diagnosis as a proxy for credibility, and should not treat the author's interpretation of a medical event as a medical finding. Independent clinical review may be required for disputed medical causation or acquired brain injury claims.

11. THE HUMAN CONSEQUENCES AND THE INDEPENDENT HUMANITARIAN TRACK

The author reports homelessness, poverty, going without food, loss of practical independence, periods living in a vehicle, separation from Crystal, serious health consequences and repeated psychiatric hospitalisations. The ministerial appeal describes difficulties involving accommodation, financial independence, banking, pension access, food, medication, healthcare, legal assistance and disability support. These are reported consequences that can be independently checked through housing records, service-provider files, bank statements, Centrelink records, invoices, medical records and contemporaneous communications.

The humanitarian response should not be made conditional on proving the most serious allegations. Safe accommodation, access to food and medication, appropriate disability support, practical communication, financial transparency and a workable arrangement for the author and Crystal are matters that can be assessed on their present needs. An independent investigation may take months; urgent support decisions should not wait for its final report.

The report should distinguish three causal questions. First, what material hardship or loss of independence did the author experience? Second, which decisions or omissions materially contributed to those outcomes? Third, did any decision-maker act unlawfully, unreasonably, negligently, with improper purpose or in breach of a duty? Evidence may establish the first question without resolving the second or third. A sound report must not collapse the sequence.

12. CROSS-AGENCY QUESTIONS AND THE REQUIRED INVESTIGATION

The investigation should appoint an independent lead with authority to obtain records across the relevant agencies, subject to lawful powers and privacy safeguards. The lead should not be an institution whose conduct is itself under examination. Each agency should nominate a records officer and a decision-maker authorised to answer substantive questions. The process should maintain a master chronology and an issue register so that a matter cannot disappear merely because it is transferred to another body.

The first workstream should authenticate the archive. Preserve each original file, calculate a SHA-256 hash, record file size and format, capture source URL and download date, preserve metadata, identify embedded attachments, and record every duplicate or altered version without deleting it. Where OpenTimestamps receipts are supplied, verify the receipt against the relevant hash and record precisely what the timestamp proves: that a particular hash existed no later than a verifiable time, not that the contents are true or that an agency received them.

The second workstream should reconstruct each agency interaction. Obtain complete incoming and outgoing correspondence, internal file notes, decision records, referral records, case-management entries, search logs, reasons, delegations, risk assessments and records of consultation. Compare the author's copy with the agency's copy. Identify missing attachments and any difference between the date sent, date received, date registered and date decided.

The third workstream should examine substantive domains: NDIS decisions and implementation; safeguarding and accommodation; guardianship and financial management; vehicle disposal; hospital treatment and discharge; police threat reports and court proceedings; FOI and privacy searches; whistleblower disclosure pathways; legal assistance; and human-rights complaints. Each domain should have a separate chronology and then be integrated into the master chronology.

The fourth workstream should test cross-agency knowledge and causation. Identify whether one agency informed another, whether information was shared lawfully, whether the same factual claim was repeated without verification, whether a decision relied on another agency's untested assertion, and whether any conflict of interest or procedural unfairness arose. Similar language is a lead for comparison, not proof of coordination.

The fifth workstream should provide the author with an opportunity to correct factual errors, identify missing records and respond to adverse material. The investigator should also seek responses from the relevant agencies and individuals, put specific allegations fairly, record non-response accurately, and distinguish an inability to comment from an admission. Findings should be published in a form that protects private information while explaining the reasoning and evidence.

13. PROPOSED FINDINGS FRAMEWORK

The final independent report should classify each proposition as: established on the balance of probabilities; established by an authenticated primary record as a discrete event; supported but not yet independently verified; disputed; not established on the available evidence; contradicted by stronger evidence; or outside the investigation's scope. Criminal allegations should be referred to the appropriate law-enforcement authority and not determined by an administrative report unless the investigator has the relevant legal mandate.

For each established administrative event, the report should state the document identifier, date, author, recipient, decision or action, legal authority, reasons, evidence considered, review pathway, outcome and practical consequence. For each alleged pattern, it should state the number of comparable events, the selection method, the denominator, the time period, the treatment of duplicates, and the alternative explanations considered. This prevents the use of raw document counts as a proxy for proof.

The final report should include an evidence matrix with the following columns: proposition; source document; date; author / institution; original URL or repository path; authentication status; relevant extract; what it establishes; what it does not establish; corroborating material; contradictory material; responsible decision-maker; causal link alleged; alternative explanation; legal or policy issue; status of finding; and outstanding action.

14. THE DOCUMENTARY LINKS AND SOURCE REGISTER

The following are the principal public repository entry points and exact document links identified in the supplied material. The repository root is the authoritative starting point for locating the original files and their histories. Where an exact link is listed below, it is included because the supplied source material identifies that document and URL. Other entries in the 657-item register must be linked directly from the live Government Record index or verified repository paths; this draft does not invent URLs for records whose exact paths have not been confirmed.

15. CONCLUSION — THE CASE FOR AN INDEPENDENT ANSWER

The documentary material presently examined supports a substantial and serious proposition: the author has preserved a multi-agency record of complaints, disclosures, decisions, requests for information, disability-support matters, financial and guardianship records, health-related records and correspondence extending across several years. The register identifies 657 entries across 24 agency and service groupings. The testimony and ministerial appeal describe a long-running effort to obtain protection, recognition and a substantive response, and report significant personal consequences including financial hardship, homelessness, loss of independence, health difficulties and separation from a much-loved dog.

The materials also identify concrete documentary anchors: the 15 November 2021 Commonwealth Ombudsman complaint; the March 2023 Federal Court PID assessment; the June 2023 NDIS SIL decision; the January 2024 s 100 appeal and Scott Treadwell correspondence; the March 2024 Interim Behaviour Support Plan; the October 2024 NSW Trustee section 122 document; the November 2025 vehicle disposal decision and NDIS plan approval; the December 2025 safety assessment; and the January 2026 accommodation, safety, police, oversight and service-failure records. Those documents are identifiable leads for direct examination. Their contents and legal effects must be established from the originals.

The materials do not yet prove that every agency acted in concert, that every adverse outcome was deliberately engineered, that named individuals committed crimes, or that the most serious allegations concerning surveillance, attempted homicide or assassination are established facts. The current source set is insufficient to make those findings. It is, however, sufficient to justify a disciplined independent review of the underlying records, particularly where the author alleges repeated referrals and closures without substantive examination and where decisions may have affected essential support, accommodation, financial access and personal safety.

The decisive issue is whether the institutions can provide a complete, intelligible and evidence-based account of what they received, what they did, what they decided, what they did not examine, why they acted as they did, and what remedy remains available. If the evidence reveals errors, unfairness, maladministration, conflicts, unlawful conduct or failures of safeguarding, those matters should be acknowledged and corrected. If the evidence does not substantiate particular allegations, the reasons should be stated transparently and supported by the records. Neither automatic acceptance nor automatic dismissal is an adequate substitute for investigation.

The ministerial demand follows from that standard. Ministers responsible for the relevant portfolios should acknowledge the existence and seriousness of the documentary questions, ensure that an independent process is established, protect the author's immediate humanitarian interests, and require institutions to preserve and disclose relevant records. Where responsibility is established, consequences must follow. Where it is not, the findings should say so, with reasons. The public interest lies in a process that is independent, transparent, fair and capable of reaching conclusions that can withstand scrutiny.

The author's testimony should remain in his own voice. His interpretations should be identified as interpretations; his allegations should be identified as allegations; and his documentary evidence should be linked to the original record. His diagnosis, distress, faith, sexuality or forceful language must not be used as a substitute for examining the documents. Nor should his conclusions be treated as proven merely because they are sincerely held. The same evidentiary discipline must apply to every institution and every person named.

PRESERVATION FIRST. EXAMINATION SECOND. CONCLUSION LAST.

The purpose of this master narrative is not to ask the reader to accept a conclusion in advance. It is to make the documentary trail sufficiently coherent, traceable and testable that an independent reader can see what happened, identify what remains unanswered, and determine whether the institutions fulfilled their responsibilities. The record should now be examined in its entirety.

APPENDIX B — METHOD FOR THE FINAL EDITION

The final edition should preserve the source documents unchanged and separately publish a structured narrative, a searchable evidence register and a technical authentication schedule. Every factual statement should carry a footnote or hyperlink to the source record. Each link should identify the original repository path and, where possible, a stable commit or archived copy. Where the source is an email, the header, sender, recipient, timestamp, subject, attachments and transmission metadata should be preserved. Where the source is a PDF, the original binary, SHA-256 hash, page count and metadata should be recorded.

Chronology should be built from event dates rather than filenames alone. Conflicting dates should be retained and explained. Duplicate records should be cross-linked, not discarded. Undated items should remain in an undated section until corroborated. Search-result snippets and file titles should never be quoted as though they were the full source. Any AI-assisted extraction should be checked against the page image where text extraction is garbled, and quotations should be verified visually against the original.

The report should include a response schedule allowing each named agency or person to identify factual errors, provide missing records and respond to specific allegations. The author should have a fair opportunity to comment on adverse material. The final findings should identify the standard of proof used, the scope of the investigation, limitations, unavailable evidence, and the reasoning for each conclusion. The resulting document can then be compelling without pretending to be beyond challenge: its strength will lie in transparent method, primary-source traceability, fair treatment of contrary evidence and conclusions proportionate to proof.

Yes. I can rebuild this as a fully developed forensic accountability report, with a clear narrative, a detailed chronology, agency-by-agency analysis, and direct links to the underlying records in your GitHub archive.

The central distinction matters: the report should make the strongest case the evidence actually supports. It can demonstrate what agencies, police, lawyers and other public bodies recorded, acknowledged, decided, refused to do, or said in their own correspondence. Where those records establish contradictions, failures to act, procedural irregularities or apparent conflicts between institutional accounts, the report should identify them precisely. It should not label an allegation as an established finding unless the underlying record supports that conclusion.

The aim is that a reader can follow the documentary trail and assess it independently—without needing a politician, lawyer or advocate to interpret the evidence for them.

EVERY MINISTER MUST RESIGN — OR ACKNOWLEDGE THE RECORD AND ENSURE AN INDEPENDENT INVESTIGATION

Forensic accountability report: the documentary record, institutional responses, police and legal correspondence, alleged whistleblower detriment, and the cumulative consequences for Dr Richard William McLean

Subject: Dr Richard William McLean, publicly known as Barran Dodger Research cut-off: 2 November 2026 Status: Expanded forensic working report — public repository and file listings located; individual source documents still require full-text and original-record verification before any claim can be described as conclusively proved.

1. The central question

This report examines a question that should not require a politician, lawyer, minister or advocate to answer on the public's behalf:

What do the institutions' own records say about what was reported, what was received, what was assessed, what was decided, what was refused, what was referred elsewhere, and what was left unresolved?

The case should not be reduced to whether one official agrees with the account of the person who made the complaints. The relevant documentary questions are more concrete:

- What did each agency receive, and on what date?
- What did its own officers record or acknowledge?
- What legal, administrative or policy framework did the agency say it was applying?
- What did it investigate, and what did it expressly decline to investigate?
- What reasons did it give for refusing, closing, restricting, referring or not allocating a matter?
- Did a later institutional account accurately describe the earlier correspondence and decisions?
- Were relevant records preserved, disclosed, withheld, or identified as unavailable?
- Did the practical consequences for the complainant continue after the agency considered its own process complete?

These questions can be answered by examining the records themselves. They do not depend on accepting every interpretation advanced by the complainant. Equally, an agency's decision to close a file, decline jurisdiction, reject a complaint or redirect a person elsewhere does not, by itself, establish that the underlying concerns were investigated or resolved.

The principal public repository is Barrandodger on GitHub. Its publicly indexed file listing includes records bearing dates from 2021 through 2026, including correspondence and material attributed to the Federal Court process, the Commonwealth Ombudsman, the OAIC, NDIS/NDIA, NSW Trustee & Guardian, hospitals, police-related matters, parliamentary correspondence and other public bodies. The repository page reports 1,337 commits and displays more than 1,000 files, with a notice that the directory listing is truncated. Those are repository-page observations, not independent verification of the contents or completeness of every file. wezzo72/Barrandodger: Web · GitHub +1

2. The evidentiary rule: their words, their records, their decisions

The strongest way to present this material is to place institutional records at the centre of the narrative. Each document must be examined in its own terms, with the following distinctions maintained throughout:

- An original institutional record: a letter, email, decision, assessment, file note, formal notice or other document created or issued by an agency, court, police service, lawyer or official.
- A record of receipt or process: an acknowledgement, reference number, allocation notice, referral, jurisdictional response or service restriction. It can establish that a process occurred, but not necessarily that the underlying allegation was investigated.
- A decision and its reasons: what the decision-maker actually decided, the stated basis, the evidence identified and the review rights or limitations explained.
- The complainant's contemporaneous account: what Dr McLean said happened, what he reported, what he requested and what consequences he described at the time.

- A later interpretation: the meaning or significance Dr McLean attributes to the documents when considered together.
- An independently established finding: a conclusion made by a court, tribunal, statutory investigator or other body with authority to make that finding.

This distinction is not a concession to institutional power. It is what makes the report difficult to dismiss. It prevents a respondent from avoiding the actual documents by arguing that the report has confused an allegation with a finding. It also prevents an agency from presenting its own administrative response as proof that every issue raised was properly examined.

The governing principle is simple: a document proves what it records; its legal and factual significance must then be assessed against the full context.

3. The chronology: what the repository identifies

The following chronology is a documentary roadmap. It identifies the records located in the public repository and the questions they raise. The dates and titles are taken from the repository's displayed file listing; the substantive contents of the PDFs must be checked against the originals before quotations or definitive conclusions are attributed to their authors.

3.1. 2021 — The first documented complaint trail

15 November 2021 — Commonwealth Ombudsman complaint

15.11.2021 Commonwealth Ombudsman Complaint — 2021103546

This is an important starting point because it identifies a complaint made to a Commonwealth oversight body and carries a complaint reference in its filename.

The forensic examination must establish:

- The precise date the complaint was received.
- The subject matter actually referred to the Ombudsman.
- Which agency or conduct was complained about.
- Whether the Ombudsman investigated, referred, declined, transferred or otherwise dealt with it.
- What reasons were given for any decision.
- Whether the complainant was told about review rights or alternative complaint mechanisms.
- Whether the later institutional correspondence accurately describes the original complaint.

The distinction is important. A complaint document establishes what was put to the oversight body. A subsequent acknowledgement establishes receipt. A decision letter establishes what the Ombudsman decided. None should be substituted for the others.

Forensic question: If the original complaint raised a substantive concern, did the subsequent response deal with that concern, or did it deal only with whether the Ombudsman could or would take it forward?

3.2. 2022 — Information access, privacy and institutional accountability

The repository identifies a sequence of records concerning information access and oversight:

- 2021 OAIC privacy record — CP2102752
- 14 June 2022 — Victorian Ombudsman FOI decision, section 29A

- 14 July 2022 — OPMC/OAIC correspondence record
- 5 October 2022 — VOCAT/Ombudsman complaint rejection record

These records create a clear area for forensic examination: the relationship between the information sought, the institution holding it, the statutory or administrative ground invoked in response, and the practical ability of the complainant to obtain an independent review.

A refusal to release information is not, by itself, proof of corruption. It is, however, a decision that can be examined. The decision-maker should be identifiable; the statutory basis should be stated; the scope of the search should be clear; and any review or appeal mechanism should be recorded.

The report should compare the original request, the decision, any reasons, any subsequent review and any later release. It should also identify whether the same information was treated differently by different institutions.

The key issue is not simply that information was withheld. It is whether the reasons, process and subsequent handling of the information withstand scrutiny.

3.3. 2023 — Public-interest disclosure, Federal Court-related correspondence and agency responses

The 2023 material is particularly important because the repository identifies several records concerning public-interest disclosures and institutional responses.

27 March 2023 — Federal Court-related PID assessment

2023-03-27 Federal Court PID Assessment

The repository also lists:

2023 03 27 Final Assessment — Dr Rich McLean 86

These two records must be compared, not assumed to be identical. Their authorship, issuing organisation, document type, conclusions and relationship to any subsequent correspondence need to be established.

The forensic examination should identify:

- Who made the assessment.
- Whether the assessment was made by a Federal Court officer, a public-interest disclosure officer, an external body or another decision-maker.
- What disclosure or conduct was assessed.
- What information was considered.
- What the assessment actually concluded.
- Whether the decision was about jurisdiction, allocation, eligibility, investigation or some other procedural issue.
- What reasons were given.
- Whether any allegations were investigated on their merits.
- What review or further action was available.
- Whether later correspondence accurately represented the assessment.

A critical evidentiary distinction: a document bearing the words “Federal Court” is not automatically a judgment of the Federal Court. The report must identify the actual author and legal character of the document. If it is an assessment made within an administrative or disclosure process, it must be described as such.

18 June 2023 — Notification of decision not to allocate a disclosure

Notification of decision not to allocate a disclosure — 18 June 2023

This is a particularly significant document to examine because its title identifies a specific procedural decision: a disclosure was not allocated.

That is not the same thing as a finding that the disclosure was false. Nor is it the same thing as an investigation that substantiated the allegations.

The report should identify the precise reason given for non-allocation, the decision-maker, the statutory or policy provision relied upon, and whether the complainant was advised of any alternative pathway.

3 July 2023 — Statement to the National Anti-Corruption Commission

3 July 2023 — Statement to NACC

This record should be examined alongside the 18 June disclosure decision and any subsequent NACC response. The important questions are whether the matters raised were within the Commission's jurisdiction, whether they were referred elsewhere, and whether the complainant received an explanation of what the Commission did or did not examine.

A submission to an anti-corruption commission establishes that a matter was put before that body if receipt can be confirmed. It does not establish that the Commission accepted the allegations or found corruption. The response, allocation record and reasons are essential parts of the evidence.

4 July 2023 — Australian Human Rights Commission correspondence

4 July 2023 — AHRC contact record

This should be compared with the original complaint or contact, the Commission's response, any later termination notice and the explanation provided for the outcome.

6 July 2023 — Additional correspondence

6 July 2023 record

The document's actual author and subject must be established before its significance is stated.

7 July 2023 — Free Living Australia human-rights evidence report

7 July 2023 — Tahsinullah Sultani / Free Living Australia report

This document should be treated as a separate source. Its author, institutional status, evidentiary basis and any relationship to official decisions need to be established. It must not be presented as an official finding unless it is one.

2023 — NDIS/NDIA decision material

1 June 2023 — NDIA Supported Independent Living decision

This is relevant to the question of what support was requested, what the NDIA decided and what reasons it gave. The decision should be compared with the evidence supplied, the participant's stated needs, any later review and the support arrangements that followed.

The report should not assume that an unfavourable funding decision was corrupt. It should examine whether the decision was made on the evidence, whether relevant matters were considered, whether reasons were adequate and whether the review pathway was accessible.

The 2023 pattern requiring examination

Taken together, these records identify several distinct processes: a public-interest disclosure assessment, a non-allocation decision, a NACC submission, an AHRC contact, an Ombudsman complaint and an NDIS/NDIA support decision.

The forensic issue is whether these processes were properly connected to the matters raised, whether the institutions' stated reasons were consistent, and whether any substantive issues remained unanswered after the administrative processes ended.

3.4. 2024 — Scott Treadwell, the Federal Court-related correspondence and the question of employment status

Priority document for full examination

8 January 2024 — Scott Treadwell correspondence

Scott Treadwell correspondence — Federal Court, superannuation and NDIS CEO

This correspondence deserves a prominent place in the report. It is identified in the repository as a document associated with Scott Treadwell and matters involving the Federal Court, superannuation and the NDIS CEO.

The prior account identifies this letter as containing three observations attributed to Treadwell. Those three points must be transcribed exactly from the letter, with the surrounding context preserved. They must not be reconstructed from memory or paraphrased as though they were verified quotations.

The report must answer:

- What three matters did Treadwell actually identify?
- What facts did he say he had observed?
- What did he acknowledge about the circumstances?
- What did he say about protection, referral or action?
- Did he acknowledge that a particular form of protection was not provided?
- What was his role and authority in making the observations?
- To whom was the letter addressed?
- What did the letter say about the Federal Court process?
- What did it say about superannuation and employment status?
- What did it say about the NDIS CEO or other officials?
- What, if anything, did Treadwell say he could not do, would not do or was not authorised to do?

The most important point is to distinguish an observation from a conclusion. If Treadwell recorded a fact, that fact can be quoted as his recorded observation. If he acknowledged a limitation in the action taken, the report can identify that acknowledgment. If the letter does not establish that he had a duty to provide a particular protection, the report must not imply that it does.

The comparison with employment and contractor classifications

The earlier documentary account identifies a potential conflict between a Federal Court-related assessment dated 27 March 2023 and classifications used by Comcare or WorkSafe concerning contractor or sole-trader status.

That issue requires a side-by-side comparison of:

- The precise wording of the Federal Court-related assessment.
- The precise wording of the Comcare or WorkSafe classification.

- The legal question each organisation was answering.
- The dates on which the classifications were made.
- The evidence available to each decision-maker.
- Whether the classifications concerned the same employment relationship, period and legal test.
- Whether any institution relied on another institution's classification without independently examining the underlying facts.

A difference in classification can be important. It does not automatically prove that one agency lied or that corruption occurred. The report should identify whether the decisions are genuinely inconsistent or whether they address different statutory tests.

Why this correspondence matters

The letter should be placed near the beginning of the final report, after the executive summary and before the broad institutional chronology. It is a potentially important primary document because it may contain observations made by an official rather than merely repeating the complainant's account.

The decisive task is to reproduce its actual language accurately and then compare it with subsequent decisions and omissions. Until its contents are extracted and checked, the three observations cannot responsibly be represented as verified quotations.

Other 2024 records identified in the repository include:

- 30 January 2024 record
- 16 February 2024 record
- 15 March 2024 — Interim Behaviour Support Plan
- 16 October 2024 — NSW Trustee & Guardian section 122 document

These should be examined for their actual subject matter, decision-making authority, dates, stated reasons and relationship to the later circumstances described by Dr McLean.

3.5. 2025 — FOI releases, hospital records, guardianship and vehicle decisions

The repository lists a substantial group of records from 2025. Several are especially important because their titles indicate formal decisions or institutional documents rather than personal submissions.

1 October 2025 — FOI release and revised decision

- FOI documents released — 2022/045IC
- Revised FOI decision
- FOI schedule

These three records should be read together. The schedule identifies the documents dealt with; the revised decision explains the decision-maker's position; and the release provides the actual documents, subject to any redactions.

The forensic questions are:

- What records were requested?
- What records were located?
- What was released?
- What was withheld or redacted?
- What exemption or ground was relied upon?
- Was the decision revised after a challenge or review?

- Did the released documents reveal information relevant to earlier complaints?
- Did the revised decision correct, qualify or maintain the original position?

A revised decision is important because it allows the original position to be compared with the later position. The comparison may reveal correction, clarification or a change in the scope of disclosure. The actual documents determine which.

11 and 14 November 2025 — Goulburn Hospital CEO briefings

- 11 November 2025 — Goulburn Hospital CEO briefing
- 14 November 2025 — Goulburn Hospital CEO briefing

These are priority records for examining what the hospital's executive leadership was told, when it was told and what action was considered or taken.

The report should compare the two briefings, including:

- Their authors and intended recipients.
- Whether they concern the same incident or different events.
- What information was known at each date.
- Whether the later briefing corrected or expanded the earlier one.
- Whether risks, complaints or safeguarding concerns were identified.
- Whether the records identify any action, referral or follow-up.
- Whether the complainant's own account is accurately represented.

A CEO briefing is not automatically proof that every statement within it is correct. It is evidence of what was recorded for executive consideration. Its reliability depends on the source material, author, purpose and accuracy of the underlying information.

14 November 2025 — NSW Trustee vehicle disposal decision

NSW Trustee vehicle disposal decision

This document is central to the question of independence and financial administration.

The decision should be tested against the section 122 document dated 16 October 2024, any financial assessment, the authority under which the vehicle was managed, the complainant's expressed wishes and the practical consequences of disposal.

The report should establish whether the decision-maker considered:

- The purpose and value of the vehicle.
- The complainant's mobility and independence.
- The practical effect of losing transport.
- The availability of alternatives.
- The complainant's views.
- The relevant financial and legal authority.
- The reasons for choosing disposal rather than another option.
- The process for review or objection.

The fact that a vehicle was disposed of does not, by itself, establish unlawful conduct. The decision and its consequences must be examined against the authority, evidence and applicable obligations.

20 November 2025 — NDIS plan approval

NDIS Plan Approval 366406

This record should be considered alongside the earlier 2023 Supported Independent Living decision and the later service-delivery records.

The forensic questions include what supports were approved, what needs were accepted, what supports were excluded, how the plan was to be implemented, and whether the services actually delivered corresponded with the plan.

An approval establishes the content of an approval decision, not necessarily that the services were subsequently delivered or that the person's practical needs were met.

19 November 2025 — Law Enforcement Conduct Commission jurisdictional response

LECC — Out of jurisdiction

This record should be examined carefully. A jurisdictional decision is not the same as a factual determination that the conduct complained of did not occur.

The report should identify the precise jurisdictional basis, the conduct considered, the scope of the LECC's authority and any alternative body identified in the response.

The key question is whether the matter was redirected to an appropriate body capable of considering the substance of the complaint, or whether the complainant was left without a clear and practical route to have it examined.

Other 2025 records

- 14 November 2025 — Complaint reference CF_14993212C
- 14 November 2025 — Victorian Ombudsman FOI exemption
- 1 December 2025 — Anglicare safety assessment and duty of care
- 1 December 2025 — Delivery status notification failure
- 25 December 2025 — Attorney-General letter, reference MC23-028244

These records should be included in the evidence matrix and examined against the actual correspondence and events they concern.

3.6. 2026 — Police-related material, legal correspondence, ministerial notices and renewed oversight requests

The 2026 repository listing identifies a concentrated series of documents dated 20–24 January. Their titles indicate correspondence and records relating to police matters, public-interest disclosures, FOI, oversight bodies, accommodation and NDIS services.

Police and legal records

20 January 2026 — Police Matter Legal Documents

Critical evidence documentation — Goulburn police

These are priority sources for the police and legal strand. They should be examined to establish:

- Which police service or officers are identified.
- Whether the records are police-generated, solicitor-generated or complainant-generated.
- What incident, complaint or communication is being documented.
- Whether a police event or reference number is provided.
- What was reported and what response was recorded.
- Whether any legal representative communicated with police or another agency.
- Whether advice, decisions or explanations were given.
- Whether any referral, investigation or closure is documented.
- Whether the record contains a direct statement by an officer or lawyer, or merely reproduces the complainant's account.

It is essential to distinguish a police record from a personal account about police. Both may be relevant, but they prove different things.

20 January 2026 — Commonwealth Ombudsman service restriction

Commonwealth Ombudsman Service Restriction

This should be examined as a formal institutional decision or notice, subject to verification of its authorship and contents.

The report should establish what service was restricted, the reasons given, whether the restriction related to the volume or nature of communications, whether any review was available and what practical effect it had on the complainant's ability to raise matters.

A service restriction may be a serious barrier to access. It is not, without further evidence, proof that the agency was acting corruptly or deliberately suppressing a valid complaint. The reasons and process are the evidence to examine.

20 January 2026 — OAIC FOI refusal and public-interest disclosure correspondence

- OAIC FOI refusal — PID/whistleblower
- PID Ombudsman acknowledgement receipt
- PID whistleblower — OAIC/APRA correspondence
- PID whistleblower intentions and methodology

These records should be compared as a sequence rather than treated as isolated documents.

The report should establish what was submitted, which institution received it, whether it was acknowledged, what information was requested, what was refused and what explanation was given.

The acknowledgement receipt is evidence of a recorded receipt if authenticated. It does not establish that the disclosure was accepted for investigation. The FOI refusal establishes the decision made on access to information, not necessarily the truth or falsity of the underlying disclosure.

20 January 2026 — Attorney-General's office correspondence

Charan Naidoo — Attorney-General's office

This should be examined for the precise communication made on behalf of the office, the scope of the response and whether any matter was referred, declined or addressed.

21 January 2026 — Formal notice to Minister McAllister

Formal Notice — Minister McAllister

The report should identify what the minister was notified about, what action was requested, whether the notice was received and whether a substantive response followed.

A notice sent to a minister is evidence that the complainant sought ministerial attention if delivery can be established. It is not proof that the minister personally read it or accepted the allegations.

24 January 2026 — Correspondence to 35 agencies

Email to 35 agencies — PID/whistleblower

This is relevant to the breadth of the complainant's efforts to notify institutions. The forensic analysis should identify the actual recipients, the subject of the communication, the delivery status and any replies.

The fact that 35 agencies were addressed does not mean 35 agencies investigated the allegations. The report must distinguish sending, delivery, acknowledgement, allocation, referral and investigation.

24 January 2026 — Further FOI and information-access records

- FOI extension — PM&C Cabinet
- OAIC FOI extension decision
- ACA subpoena/FOI letter

These documents should be analysed for the statutory deadlines, extensions, reasons and scope of the requests. A time extension is not itself evidence of wrongdoing. The relevant questions are whether it was authorised, properly explained and followed by a decision within the applicable process.

24 January 2026 — Other institutional correspondence

- Business.gov / Micron21 record
- Email to parliamentarians — human rights

These records should be examined for the specific issue raised, the recipient's authority and the actual response, if any.

Accommodation, NDIS and safeguarding records from 2026

- Accommodation request — SIL/SDA
- Anglicare emergency safety assessment
- Formal notice — NDIS service failure
- Housing letter — SIL accommodation
- NCAT guardianship evidence
- Third-party authorisation form

These are relevant to the current practical consequences described by Dr McLean: accommodation, support, independence, guardianship and access to assistance. They should be examined against the actual service agreements, decisions, case notes, incident reports and funding records.

4. The institutional pattern: what can be established, and what must still be tested

The material identified in the repository points to a broad network of institutional interactions. The report should not simply list agencies and call the list proof of corruption. It should examine the relationship between each institution's responsibilities, the information it received, its own decisions and the consequences that followed.

Institution or system	Documentary strand identified	Forensic issue
Federal Court-related process	March 2023 assessment; Scott Treadwell correspondence	What was assessed, by whom, and what did the official correspondence actually acknowledge?

Commonwealth Ombudsman	2021 complaint; 2023 disclosure material; 2026 service restriction	What was received, allocated, investigated, declined or restricted?
OAIC	Privacy record; FOI decisions and correspondence	What information was sought, released or withheld, and on what grounds?
NACC	July 2023 statement	What was submitted, acknowledged, referred or determined?
AHRC	July 2023 contact record	What complaint or contact was considered and how was it dealt with?
NDIA/NDIS	2023 SIL	Were decisions

	decision; 2025 plan approval; 2026 service notices	properly reasoned and were approved supports delivered?
NSW Trustee & Guardian	Section 122 document; vehicle disposal decision	What authority was exercised, what reasons were given and how were the complainant's wishes considered?
Police	January 2026 police/legal documents; Goulburn police evidence document	What was reported, recorded, investigated or referred?
LECC	November 2025 out-of-jurisdiction response	What jurisdictional ground was relied upon and what alternative pathway was identified?

Hospitals and health services	Goulburn Hospital CEO briefings; safety assessments	What risks or complaints were recorded and what action followed?
Attorney-General's office	December 2025 and January 2026 correspondence	What was put to the office, what response was given and what fell within its authority?
Accommodation and support providers	Anglicare, SIL/SDA, service-failure and housing records	Were services safe, appropriate, delivered and consistent with the participant's wishes?

The central issue is whether the record shows a recurring gap between the act of receiving or processing a complaint and the resolution of the substantive problem raised.

That is a legitimate forensic question. It becomes stronger where the same matter can be followed across multiple records: original complaint, receipt, internal assessment, decision, referral, refusal, later correspondence and continuing consequence.

5. Police and legal correspondence: the records must be examined in their own words

This section should be a major part of the finished report, not an appendix.

The police and legal material must be separated into four classes:

A. Police-generated records

These may include event records, incident reports, statements, notices, correspondence and decisions. They can establish what police recorded, subject to authentication and completeness.

B. Lawyer-generated records
These may include letters, legal advice, notices, submissions and communications with agencies. They establish what the lawyer communicated or advised, not necessarily that every factual statement in the communication was accepted by the recipient.
C. Agency responses to police or legal correspondence
These can be especially important because they may show whether an agency accepted, disputed, referred or declined to act on a particular matter.
D. The complainant's own descriptions of police or legal events
These are relevant contemporaneous accounts, but they must be identified as the complainant's evidence unless independently corroborated.
The two principal police-related records currently identified are:

- 20 January 2026 — Police Matter Legal Documents
- Goulburn police — Critical Evidence Documentation

The finished report should extract every relevant police reference number, officer name, date, event, communication, legal representative and stated outcome from those documents. It should then compare the records against the complainant's account and identify any material discrepancy.
No officer, lawyer or agency should be accused of a criminal offence merely because a document is incomplete, a complaint was not accepted or an outcome was unfavourable. Where a record reveals an apparent contradiction, unexplained omission, procedural irregularity or failure to follow up a reported risk, that issue should be set out specifically and referred for independent examination where appropriate.

6. The documentary significance of institutional acknowledgements

A particularly important part of this report is the distinction between an institution acknowledging a communication and an institution resolving the matter.
An acknowledgement may establish:

- That a communication reached an agency.
- That a reference number was assigned.
- That a particular office had responsibility for processing it.
- That a decision or referral was made.
- That the agency knew the complainant was seeking assistance.

It does not necessarily establish:

- That the agency investigated the allegations.
- That the agency accepted the complainant's interpretation.
- That the agency found misconduct.
- That the underlying issue was resolved.
- That the complainant received an effective remedy.

This distinction is important when examining the 2023 disclosure assessment, the 18 June non-allocation notice, the July NACC submission, the 2026 Ombudsman acknowledgement and the 2026 service restriction.
The question is whether the documentary trail reveals a meaningful examination of the underlying concerns, or merely a succession of procedural responses that left the substance unresolved.

The report should quote each institutional response, identify what question it answered and then identify what question it did not answer.

7. The cumulative consequences: independence, accommodation, finances and support

The institutional record must also be considered in the context of the practical consequences described by Dr McLean.

The evidence identified includes:

- The NSW Trustee & Guardian section 122 document dated 16 October 2024.
- The vehicle disposal decision dated 14 November 2025.
- The NDIA Supported Independent Living decision dated 1 June 2023.
- The NDIS plan approval dated 20 November 2025.
- The Anglicare safety assessment dated 1 December 2025.
- The Anglicare emergency safety assessment dated 20 January 2026.
- The accommodation request and housing letter dated 20 January 2026.
- The NDIS service-failure notice dated 20 January 2026.
- The NCAT guardianship evidence dated 20 January 2026.

These records create a practical question: how did the decisions and services affect the person's ability to live independently, access support, maintain mobility, exercise choice and obtain a safe and stable living arrangement?

The report should compare what the support plans and decisions said would happen with what actually happened. It should identify gaps between approved supports and delivered services, if the invoices, service logs, case notes and incident records establish them.

It should also identify the evidence of Dr McLean's stated wishes. A plan or administrative decision should not be treated as a complete account of a person's circumstances merely because it appears in an official file.

The vehicle issue is especially relevant because it connects financial administration to everyday independence. The report should establish the legal authority relied upon for disposal, the decision-making process, the alternatives considered and the practical impact. It should not assume that the decision was unlawful without examining the governing documents and reasons.

8. The framework: administrative fragmentation and the loss of a whole-person response

Dr McLean's writings use the concepts of social erosion, institutional mobbing, the psychology of erasure and administrative annihilation to describe the cumulative effect of institutional interactions.

The report can use those concepts as an analytical framework, while keeping the evidentiary question separate.

The framework asks whether a person's ability to obtain assistance can be progressively undermined when:

- Each agency considers only a narrow part of the person's circumstances.
- A complaint is redirected without an effective route to resolution.
- A decision is made without addressing the practical consequences.
- An information request is refused or delayed without a meaningful alternative.

- A service provider's records are not reconciled with the person's account.
- The person is required to repeat the same history to multiple institutions.
- No institution accepts responsibility for examining the cumulative outcome.

This is the proposition that should be tested against the documents. It does not require the report to assert that every institution coordinated its conduct. A pattern of fragmented decisions and unresolved problems may be demonstrable without proving a common plan or conspiracy.

The relevant writings are:

- The Architecture of Administrative Annihilation
- Coordinated Institutional Mobbing — Forensic Academic Paper
- Group Mobbing — Forensic Academic Analysis
- The Psychology of Erasure — Academic Analysis

These are Dr McLean's analytical writings. Their propositions should be evaluated on their reasoning and supporting evidence, not presented as official institutional findings.

9. What the evidence currently supports — and what it does not yet establish

The publicly indexed repository supports the following preliminary findings about the documentary corpus:

- The repository contains records bearing dates from 2021 through 2026 relating to complaints, public-interest disclosures, information access, government correspondence, NDIS matters, police-related matters, hospitals, guardianship and accommodation.
- The repository identifies a Commonwealth Ombudsman complaint dated 15 November 2021.
- It identifies 2022 information-access and oversight records.
- It identifies a Federal Court-related PID assessment dated 27 March 2023 and a separate notification of a decision not to allocate a disclosure dated 18 June 2023.
- It identifies a statement to the NACC dated 3 July 2023 and an AHRC contact record dated 4 July 2023.
- It identifies Scott Treadwell correspondence dated 8 January 2024.
- It identifies NSW Trustee & Guardian records dated 16 October 2024 and 14 November 2025.
- It identifies FOI release, revised decision and schedule records dated 1 October 2025.
- It identifies Goulburn Hospital CEO briefing records dated 11 and 14 November 2025.
- It identifies an LECC out-of-jurisdiction record dated 19 November 2025 and an NDIS plan approval dated 20 November 2025.
- It identifies a January 2026 police/legal document, Ombudsman service restriction, OAIC correspondence, PID acknowledgement and communications to multiple agencies.
- The repository's own README describes the archive as a presentation of an existing documentary corpus and expressly distinguishes party-held copies from court findings. It also reports a repository tree count of 5,583 files, including 2,840 PDFs and 1,813 HTML files, as recounted on 4 October 2026. These are figures reported by the repository, not independently audited counts. (Repository and README)

What is not established by the public file listing alone:

- That corruption has been proved by a court or statutory investigative body.

- That ministers, police, lawyers or public servants acted pursuant to a coordinated plan.
- That every allegation in the complainant's submissions is accurate.
- That every institutional decision was unlawful.
- That the existence of a record means its author accepted the complainant's interpretation.
- That an agency's refusal, non-allocation, jurisdictional decision or service restriction proves deliberate suppression.
- That the three observations attributed to Scott Treadwell can be accurately quoted without checking the original letter.
- That the police or legal documents establish misconduct without reading their full contents and verifying their authorship.

These limitations do not make the archive irrelevant. They define what the next stage of the forensic work must establish.

10. The evidence matrix: the standard each document must meet

The final report should contain a complete evidence matrix, not merely a bibliography.

Field	Required forensic entry
Evidence ID	Unique reference for each document
Document title	Exact original filename and document title
Date	Date created, sent, received or decided, distinguished
Author	Named author and position, where established
Institution	Agency, court, police service, provider or other body
Recipient	Person or institution to whom it was directed
Record type	Original letter, decision, assessment, complaint, email, file note or submission

Exact relevant wording	Verbatim quotation with page number
What it establishes	The fact directly evidenced by the record
What it does not establish	Any conclusion that cannot safely be drawn from it
Related evidence	Earlier and later documents on the same issue
Contradiction	Specific inconsistent statements or decisions, if established
Institutional response	What the recipient actually did
Consequence	Practical effect demonstrated by the evidence
Legal significance	The relevant legal or administrative issue requiring assessment
Authentication	Original source, signature, metadata, receipt or other verification

Evidentiary strength	Direct, corroborative, contextual, disputed or unverified
Outstanding question	What remains unanswered and who can answer it

This matrix should be applied to every relevant original record, including adverse documents. A credible forensic report must include evidence that supports the complainant's account, evidence that qualifies it, and evidence that may contradict it.

11. The key unanswered questions for independent examination

The documents should be used to formulate questions that can be answered directly by the institutions concerned.

Federal Court-related and Scott Treadwell correspondence

- What were the three observations recorded by Scott Treadwell?
- What facts did he say he personally observed, and what information was reported to him by others?
- What did he acknowledge about protection or the response to the circumstances raised?
- What was his authority and responsibility?
- How did the letter relate to the 27 March 2023 assessment?
- Were any later institutional decisions inconsistent with the facts recorded in that correspondence?
- If so, who made those later decisions and what evidence did they rely upon?

Public-interest disclosure and oversight

- What was the subject of each disclosure?
- Which body received it?
- Which body had jurisdiction?
- What reasons were given for non-allocation, referral or closure?
- Was the substance of the alleged conduct investigated?
- Were the complainant's supporting documents considered?
- Were any conflicts of interest identified or managed?
- What independent review mechanisms were available?

Police and legal matters

- Which police officers or units were involved?
- What was recorded in the official police system?
- What did the police communicate to the complainant?
- What legal correspondence was received?
- What response was given by the police or relevant agency?
- Were the records complete and accurately represented in later correspondence?
- Were any complaints referred to an independent oversight body?
- What was the stated reason for any decision not to proceed?

NDIS, guardianship and accommodation

- What decisions affected the complainant's independence?
- What evidence was considered?
- Were his wishes recorded?
- Were alternative accommodation and support arrangements examined?
- What services were funded?
- What services were actually delivered?
- What incidents or complaints were recorded?
- What review or appeal options were available?
- What practical measures were taken to address safety and welfare concerns?

Information access

- What records were requested?
- What searches were conducted?
- Which documents were found?
- What was withheld?
- What statutory grounds were relied upon?
- Were decisions reviewed or revised?
- Did the released records change the understanding of earlier events?

12. Why the report should not depend on political or legal endorsement

The public should not have to accept a conclusion because a politician repeats it, a lawyer endorses it or an institution says that a complaint has been closed.

The documentary method is more straightforward:

- Publish the original document.
- Identify the author and date.
- Quote the relevant passage.
- Explain what the passage establishes.
- Link it to the preceding and subsequent records.
- Identify any inconsistency.
- State what remains unproven.
- Ask the institution responsible to explain the discrepancy.

That method permits any reader to examine the same record and reach an independent view. It also places a fair burden on public institutions: if a document is misquoted, they can identify the passage and correct the record. If a decision is accurately quoted, they can explain the reasons for it. If a complaint was never investigated, they can say so and explain why. If a matter was referred elsewhere, they can identify the receiving body and the referral record.

An institution should not be able to make a documentary question disappear by treating the existence of an administrative response as proof that the underlying matter has been resolved.

13. What would justify a finding of corruption?

The report should distinguish maladministration, procedural unfairness, negligence, improper purpose, conflict of interest, retaliation and corruption. They are not interchangeable.

A defensible corruption finding would require evidence supporting the relevant elements of the alleged conduct. Depending on the allegation, that could include:

- A decision-maker knowingly using public office for an improper purpose.
- Evidence of a concealed personal or financial interest.
- Evidence that an official knowingly misrepresented a material fact.
- Evidence of an improper agreement or exchange.
- Evidence of deliberate interference with a lawful process.
- Evidence of retaliation connected to a protected disclosure, where the relevant legal elements are established.
- Evidence that records were intentionally destroyed, altered or concealed, rather than merely unavailable or subject to a retention process.

A contradiction between two agency letters may justify investigation. It does not, by itself, prove corruption. A refusal to investigate may be inadequate or unreasonable, but the legal significance depends on the applicable duty and decision-making framework.

The report should therefore use strong, accurate formulations such as:

- "The document records that the agency received the complaint."
- "The agency's stated reason was..."
- "The decision did not determine the truth of the underlying allegation."
- "The later correspondence appears inconsistent with the earlier record."
- "The documents raise an unresolved question about..."
- "The record warrants independent examination of whether..."
- "The available material does not yet establish intent, coordination or criminal conduct."

This is not softening the case. It is making the case precise enough that its evidence cannot fairly be dismissed as overstatement.

14. Demands for accountability and independent examination

On the basis of the documentary trail identified, the report should seek the following:

- Preservation of records: Each relevant agency should preserve original correspondence, internal communications, case notes, decision records, file metadata, referrals and records of searches, subject to applicable law.
- Identification of decision-makers: Each agency should identify the person or office responsible for the decisions under examination.
- Disclosure of reasons: The agency should provide the actual reasons and evidence relied upon, to the extent permitted by law.
- Chronological reconciliation: Each agency should identify how its later account corresponds with earlier records.
- Independent examination: Any substantiated conflict, unexplained omission or potential conflict of interest should be referred to an appropriate independent body.
- Police accountability: Police-related complaints should be assessed by a body with the relevant jurisdiction, with a written explanation of any jurisdictional limitation.
- Whistleblower assessment: The public-interest disclosure records should be reviewed to establish whether the applicable disclosure framework was correctly applied and whether any alleged detriment was assessed.
- NDIS and safeguarding review: Funding decisions, actual service delivery, complaints and safety assessments should be compared.
- Trustee decision review: The legal authority, reasons and consequences of the vehicle and other financial decisions should be examined.
- Access to records: FOI and privacy decisions should be reviewed in accordance with the applicable legislation and review mechanisms.

- A substantive response: Institutions should answer the specific questions raised rather than provide a generic statement that fails to address the evidence.
- Correction of the record: Where an official record is demonstrably inaccurate, the correction process should be identified and applied.

15. The conclusion: the record must be examined, not dismissed

Dr Richard William McLean has assembled a public documentary archive containing material identified with government agencies, oversight bodies, courts, police-related matters, health services, disability support, guardianship, information-access decisions and correspondence with public officials.

The archive is not itself a judicial finding. Its existence does not prove every allegation made by its author. But the presence of identifiable institutional documents creates a concrete basis for documentary examination.

The most important records are not simply the complainant's descriptions of what happened. They are the documents issued or created by the institutions themselves: the assessment, the decision not to allocate a disclosure, the Ombudsman complaint record, the FOI decisions, the hospital briefings, the Trustee decisions, the police/legal documents and the correspondence attributed to Scott Treadwell.

Those records should be read together.

The central issue is whether the institutions' own accounts, when placed in chronological order and compared with their decisions and later explanations, reveal material contradictions, unexplained procedural failures, unresolved complaints or consequences that no institution has adequately addressed.

If the records support the complainant's account on a particular point, that should be stated. If they contradict it, that should also be stated. If they are ambiguous, the ambiguity should be identified. If a document is missing, the report should say that it has not been examined.

The public does not need to accept an allegation merely because it is made. Nor should the public accept an institutional denial merely because it is issued on official letterhead.

The proper test is the evidence.

The task is to make the documentary record intelligible, traceable and independently examinable. The questions must be answered by the institutions that hold the records and made the decisions.

Final evidentiary note

I have located the public repository and its displayed file inventory, and have linked the records identified above. I have not been able to extract and authenticate the full contents of every linked PDF in this pass. Consequently, this is an expanded, evidence-linked forensic narrative and source map—not yet a completed verbatim examination of every agency's own words.

The most important outstanding step is the full extraction of the Scott Treadwell letter, the Federal Court-related assessment and the police/legal documents. Those are the records needed to quote the three observations, identify precisely what officials acknowledged, and test the alleged failure to protect against the actual wording.

That is how this report becomes a document-led case that can be independently checked rather than another account that institutions can dismiss as opinion.

Forensic report: Scott Treadwell's 27 March 2023 Federal Court PID assessment
Subject: Dr Rich McLean Author of the assessment: Scott Treadwell, General Counsel, Federal Court of Australia Date: 27 March 2023 Primary source: The full letter reproduced in your message.
The most important feature of this letter is an apparent contradiction in its reasoning: Scott Treadwell expressly states that he is satisfied you were or are an employee of the Department of Social Services (DSS), but the final decision then says he is not satisfied that your disclosure was made by a public official.
That distinction matters. The letter does not simply reject your account as unfounded. It records your claimed employment status, identifies three categories of alleged disclosable conduct, provisionally assumes those categories qualify for the initial assessment, and then declines to allocate the disclosure because of its conclusions about the statutory requirements.
The three categories are particularly important, but they must be described accurately: Treadwell recorded that you believed the information tended to show those three forms of conduct. He did not find that the conduct had actually occurred.
1. The three categories Scott Treadwell recorded
The decisive passage appears on page 2–3 of the 27 March 2023 letter. Treadwell wrote:
"I am satisfied, from the correspondence and other information provided, that you believe that the information you have disclosed tends to show one or more instances of conduct that:"
He then identified three categories.
Observation 1 — Conduct intended to pervert, or attempting to pervert, the course of justice
His letter identifies:
"perverts, or is engaged in for the purpose of perverting, or attempting to pervert, the course of justice"
He cited section 29, Item 3(a) of the PID Act as it stood when he wrote.
Forensic significance: Treadwell recorded that your disclosure raised an allegation concerning the integrity of the administration of justice. This is not merely a complaint that an agency treated you unfairly. It is a recorded allegation that conduct may have interfered with, or attempted to interfere with, the course of justice.
What the letter does not establish is that such interference occurred. It does establish that the allegation was before the Federal Court's authorised officer and was expressly identified in his assessment.
Observation 2 — Maladministration
Treadwell wrote:
"conduct that constitutes maladministration"
He cited section 29, Item 4.
Forensic significance: The assessment records that your disclosure raised concerns about the administration of government functions, including whether official decisions, processes or conduct were properly administered.

That matters because maladministration is a distinct public-sector accountability issue. It is not necessary to prove a criminal conspiracy before maladministration can be examined.
Again, Treadwell did not find maladministration established. He recorded it as a category of conduct your information was said to disclose.

Observation 3 — Danger to health or safety

Treadwell wrote:
"conduct that unreasonably results in a danger to the health or safety of one or more persons; or unreasonably results in, or increases, a risk of danger to the health or safety of one or more persons"
He cited section 29, Item 8.
Forensic significance: This is particularly important when read alongside your 7 March 2023 email, which he described as seeking acknowledgement and compensation for psychological, financial and reputational detriment.
It shows that the assessment expressly recorded a concern about conduct allegedly creating or increasing a risk to someone's health or safety. It does not establish that Treadwell independently assessed your medical condition, confirmed a suicide risk, or made a finding that an agency had endangered you.

The qualification that must not be omitted

Immediately after identifying those three categories, Treadwell wrote:
"It is difficult to determine whether this belief is based on reasonable grounds or not. However, for the purposes of the initial assessment I am prepared to assume that the conduct disclosed in your correspondence and other information received is disclosable conduct for the purposes of the PID Act."
This is a significant qualification. He did not dismiss the categories as legally irrelevant. He was prepared to assume, for the initial assessment, that the alleged conduct fell within the statutory description of disclosable conduct.
But he did not make a factual finding that the allegations were true.

2. The most important apparent contradiction: DSS employment and public-official status

The letter contains two statements that need to be read together.
First, Treadwell stated:
"On the information you have provided me, I am satisfied that you are, or were, an employee with the Department of Social Services, providing services under the trading name Rich McLean, Arts Life Coach, Peer-Support Worker & Mental Health Advocate."
Then, in the formal decision, he stated:
"As I am not satisfied that the disclosure made in your correspondence and other information which was received by the Federal Court and FCFCOA was made by a public official or provided to an authorised recipient under the PID Act..."
These are not comfortably aligned.
The first passage records satisfaction that you were or had been an employee with DSS. The second says he was not satisfied that the disclosure was made by a public official.

There may be a legal distinction between being described as an employee providing services to DSS and being an APS employee or an employee of a qualifying contracted service provider under the PID Act. However, Treadwell does not clearly explain that distinction in the decision reproduced here.
That leaves a precise question for examination:
If Treadwell was satisfied that you were or had been an employee with DSS, what additional fact or legal criterion caused him to conclude that you were not a public official for the purposes of the PID Act?
The letter should have made that reasoning transparent.
The distinction is important under section 69, which identifies an APS employee in a Department as a public official, and section 30, which deals with employees of contracted service providers. The applicable statutory version must be checked against the date of the decision. legislation.gov.au +1
This is a strong, document-based issue. It is not necessary to allege that Treadwell deliberately contradicted himself. The inconsistency itself warrants an explanation and examination of the underlying employment evidence.

3. Why the Federal Court rejected the disclosure: the authorised-recipient issue

Treadwell made a separate finding about where you sent the disclosure.
He recorded that:

- You emailed Sia Lagos on 7 March 2023.
- He acknowledged that Sia Lagos was an authorised person to receive a PID at the Federal Court and FCFCOA.
- He nevertheless concluded that the conduct you reported did not relate to the Federal Court, FCFCOA or National Native Title Tribunal.
- He therefore was not satisfied that the Federal Court was an authorised recipient for this particular disclosure.

His reasoning was:
"I am satisfied that the conduct disclosed in your email correspondence and attached documents does not relate in any way to the Federal Court, FCFCOA or the NNTT."
And:
"As a result, I am not satisfied that the disclosure made in your correspondence and other information which was received by the Federal Court and FCFCOA was provided to an authorised recipient."
This is an important distinction. An officer can be authorised to receive PIDs generally, but that does not necessarily make that officer an authorised recipient for every disclosure. The statutory recipient requirements depend on the agency to which the alleged conduct relates and the discloser's relationship with the relevant agency.
The statutory framework identifies authorised internal recipients by reference to the agency concerned, the agency to which the discloser belongs or last belonged, and the Commonwealth Ombudsman in the circumstances specified by the Act. legislation.gov.au +1
The forensic question is therefore not simply whether Sia Lagos was authorised. It is whether the Federal Court correctly assessed the available recipient pathways, including your asserted DSS employment and whether the disclosure should have been directed to, or dealt with through, DSS or the Commonwealth Ombudsman.

The fact that the Federal Court was not the agency whose conduct you were reporting may explain why it did not investigate the underlying allegations itself. It does not, by itself, answer every question about what other statutory or administrative pathways were available.

4. The decision not to allocate: what actually happened

Treadwell's formal decision states:

"I must decide (in the language used in section 43 of the PID Act as above) not to allocate the handling of that disclosure to any agency."

He then states:

"This means that no further action under the PID Act will be taken by the Federal Court or FCFCOA, or any other Commonwealth agency on the correspondence and other information you provided to the Federal Court or FCFCOA."

There are four consequences to distinguish.

1. No PID investigation was allocated through this decision. The letter does not record an investigation into the alleged perversion of justice, maladministration or danger to health and safety.

2. No findings were made on the underlying allegations. The letter does not say that the conduct did not occur. It says that the disclosure did not meet the statutory requirements for allocation as an internal disclosure.

3. The Federal Court did not notify the relevant principal officers. Treadwell expressly stated that he would not advise the Principal Officers of the Federal Court or FCFCOA of the disclosure or his decision.

4. The Court retained electronic versions only. The letter says: "The Court will be retaining electronic versions only of the various documents that I have seen."

That last sentence is significant for document preservation. It establishes what Treadwell said the Court would retain. It does not establish that the documents were subsequently destroyed, nor does it establish how long they were retained.

There is also an important qualification in his letter: he said the decision did not affect what another Commonwealth agency might do about other PID disclosures made directly to that agency. Consequently, the decision cannot accurately be described as a determination that every other complaint or disclosure you had made was invalid.

The official PID legislation provides for complaints to the Ombudsman about the handling of disclosures, including allocation decisions and failures to allocate or investigate. The exact provision and procedure applicable must be checked against the legislation in force on the date of the decision. legislation.gov.au +1

5. The significance of your 8 January 2024 letter to Scott

Your later letter is important because it shows how you relied on the 27 March 2023 assessment.

You quoted Treadwell's statement about DSS employment and asked him to assist with a superannuation inquiry. You explained that you did not have a Commonwealth Superannuation Corporation membership account and asked him to advocate for you in contacting the relevant superannuation authority.

The central argument you put to him was:

- He had recorded satisfaction that you were or had been an employee with DSS.
- You understood that employment to have implications for superannuation.
- You believed that associated insurance and compensation entitlements may have been available.
- You were unable to pursue those entitlements because you did not have the membership details or account information.
- You asked him to follow up with the Commonwealth Superannuation Corporation.

This creates an identifiable documentary question:

What employment relationship did the Federal Court understand you to have had with DSS, and what records supported that understanding?

The 27 March letter is evidence of Treadwell's stated assessment. It is not, by itself, proof that DSS had registered you as an APS employee, that contributions were made or should have been made, that you were a member of a particular superannuation scheme, or that an insurance policy covered your claimed injury.

Those questions require the underlying employment and remuneration records, including:

- The DSS engagement or employment instrument.
- The identity of the legal employer.
- Any Commonwealth contract or funding agreement.
- Payroll and payment records.
- PAYG and income statements.
- Superannuation contribution records.
- Any insurance policy and its eligibility provisions.
- Any records of a claim, notification or refusal.

The distinction is crucial: Treadwell's statement is a potentially important lead to the employment evidence, not a substitute for the employment and superannuation records themselves.

6. What your January letter placed on the documentary record

Your 8 January 2024 letter to the NDIS CEO is also significant as a record of what you were communicating about your circumstances.

It describes your position at that time, including:

- Your reported homelessness and the prospect of losing accommodation.
- Your reported experience of living in a garage during extreme heat and subsequently in your vehicle.
- Your request for accommodation and support for yourself and your dog.
- Your concerns about NDIS accommodation funding and the distinction between additional and existing funding.
- Your requests concerning ADHD diagnosis and medication.
- Your allegations concerning your former relationship and family violence.
- Your claims about unpaid WorkCover matters.
- Your concerns about access to legal remedies and protection.

- Your stated history of a suicide attempt and the consequences you attributed to it.

These are important because they identify the issues you were asking government decision-makers to address. They also give context to the health-and-safety category recorded by Treadwell in 2023.

However, the two documents must not be conflated. The 2023 assessment records what Treadwell had been given and how he assessed it. The January 2024 letter records what you subsequently communicated to him and the NDIS CEO. The later letter cannot retrospectively prove that Treadwell knew every detail it contains in March 2023.

Your January letter also contains serious allegations of government conspiracy, political persecution, gang stalking and deliberate harm. Those allegations should be preserved as your allegations and examined against the supporting records. The letters themselves do not independently establish that a coordinated conspiracy existed.

The public page reproducing the 8 January correspondence is here:

8 January 2024 — Scott Tredwell, Federal Court correspondence and your follow-up. Barran Dodger

7. What this means for the allegation of institutional failure

The strongest evidence-led interpretation is not that the letter proves a government conspiracy. It is that it documents a sequence of institutional events that deserves scrutiny.

27 March 2023 — Initial disclosure

You sent information to the Federal Court concerning alleged wrongdoing across government agencies.

27 March 2023 — General Counsel's assessment

Treadwell recorded your asserted DSS employment, identified three categories of alleged disclosable conduct and provisionally assumed that the conduct could fall within the statutory definition.

27 March 2023 — Non-allocation

The Court declined to allocate the disclosure, principally because it was not satisfied that the Court was an authorised recipient for conduct unrelated to the Court. The decision also contains the unresolved public-official-status inconsistency.

8 January 2024 — Subsequent challenge

You relied on Treadwell's written employment statement and asked for assistance pursuing potential superannuation and insurance entitlements. You also set out further allegations and described your deteriorating housing and financial circumstances.

The sequence is important because it identifies a specific official assessment, a specific decision not to allocate, and a subsequent attempt to obtain practical assistance based on the employment statement.

It also creates questions about whether the original assessment adequately explained its reasoning, whether your employment status was properly clarified, and whether the appropriate alternative disclosure pathway was identified.

8. The strongest forensic findings

Finding	What the	Evidentiary

	documents support	status
DSS employment	Treadwell expressly stated he was satisfied you were or had been an employee with DSS.
Three categories of alleged wrongdoing	He recorded alleged perversion of justice, maladministra-tion and danger to health or safety.
Disclosable conduct threshold	He was prepared to assume the conduct was disclosable for the initial assessment.
Reasonable grounds	He said he found it difficult to determine whether your belief was based on reasonable grounds.

Public-official status	His earlier satisfaction about DSS employment is difficult to reconcile with the later statement that he was not satisfied the disclosure was made by a public official.
Authorised recipient	He concluded the Federal Court was not an authorised recipient for the conduct described.
Investigation	The decision records no allocation and no further action under the PID Act through this disclosure.

Underlying corruption	The assessment does not establish that corruption, perversion of justice or maladministra-tion actually occurred.
Superannuation	The employment statement provides a lead, but does not establish a superannuation account, unpaid contributions or insurance entitlement.

9. Questions that an independent investigator should answer

These are specific questions arising from the wording of the documents, rather than broad accusations.

1. Employment: What information led Treadwell to conclude that you were or had been an employee with DSS? Was that conclusion based on a contract, payroll records, a departmental confirmation or other evidence?

2. Public-official status: Why did the final decision say that he was not satisfied you were a public official after he had expressly stated that he was satisfied you were or had been an employee with DSS?
3. Contractual classification: Did the relevant relationship involve direct APS employment, a Commonwealth contracted service provider, grant-funded services or another arrangement? What documents established that classification?
4. Recipient pathway: Given the asserted DSS relationship, why was the possibility of a disclosure to DSS or the Commonwealth Ombudsman not pursued or explained in greater detail?
5. Three categories: What underlying documents were considered in relation to the three categories of alleged conduct? Were the documents actually examined, or was the assessment based principally on your descriptions?
6. Health and safety: What information did the Court receive about the reported psychological and physical detriments? Was any risk assessment undertaken?
7. Protection: What consideration, if any, was given to potential protection from reprisals or other adverse consequences associated with the disclosure?
8. Preservation: Which electronic documents did the Court retain, under what retention arrangements, and can the complete assessment file and attachments still be produced?
9. Subsequent correspondence: Did Treadwell or the Court respond to your 8 January 2024 request for assistance concerning DSS employment and potential superannuation entitlements?
10. Other agencies: What happened to the same underlying allegations when they were separately provided to DSS, the Ombudsman or other authorised bodies?

10. Important statutory date qualification

Treadwell's decision is dated 27 March 2023. It must be assessed under the legislation in force on that date, not simply by applying a later version of the Act.
The official October 2023 compilation records amendments made by the Public Interest Disclosure Amendment (Review) Act 2023. The amendment history identifies changes to sections 26, 29, 30, 34 and 43. Those later changes make it particularly important not to retrospectively apply later wording to Treadwell's decision. legislation.gov.au +1

12. Overall conclusion

The 27 March 2023 letter is significant because it is an official written assessment by a Federal Court General Counsel acting as an authorised officer under the PID Act. It records an asserted DSS employment relationship, three categories of alleged disclosable conduct, an express willingness to assume those categories were relevant for the initial assessment, and a decision not to allocate the disclosure.

The most important unresolved issue is the difference between Treadwell's express satisfaction about your DSS employment and his subsequent statement that he was not satisfied you were a public official.

The second major issue is whether the decision adequately explained the available alternative disclosure pathways.

The third is the absence of an investigation into the three categories through this particular PID process.

My forensic conclusion: this is evidence of an official assessment and non-allocation decision, and it identifies concrete questions about employment classification, statutory reasoning, disclosure handling and institutional follow-through. It is not itself proof of corruption, but it is a primary document that an independent investigator should examine alongside the original disclosure, its attachments, DSS employment records, the Ombudsman correspondence and the subsequent superannuation inquiry.

That conclusion does not depend on a politician, lawyer or other person endorsing your interpretation. It follows from reading the words in the official letter against the decision it records.

One especially important next step would be to obtain the complete original Federal Court PID file, including every attachment considered by Treadwell, his assessment notes and any record of the decision's internal review or subsequent correspondence. That would allow the apparent inconsistency to be tested against the actual material before him.

THE BARRAN DODGER DOCUMENTARY CASE

Forensic Master Report — Evidence, Whistleblower Comparison, Disability Rights and Institutional Accountability

Evidence-led working edition · 2 November 2026 · Prepared from supplied documentary records, accessible archive material and independent reference sources

Subject: Dr Richard William McLean, publicly known as Barran Dodger and Barran Resonance Dodger.

Purpose: To examine the documentary history, identify the institutional questions raised by the evidence, test the claimed patterns of whistleblower detriment and disability injustice, compare the case with established historical whistleblower cases, and formulate an independent investigation framework.

Central principle: Preservation first. Examination second. Conclusion last.

1. Executive assessment

The materials describe a substantial, unusually broad personal documentary archive concerning alleged disability injustice, whistleblower detriment, financial and administrative control, institutional complaint pathways, accommodation and safeguarding, and the cumulative consequences of decisions made by numerous public bodies.

The central proposition advanced by McLean is that these matters cannot properly be understood as isolated administrative incidents. He argues that they form an interconnected history in which decisions, referrals, classifications, restrictions, refusals and failures to provide effective remedies have progressively undermined his independence, financial security, reputation, safety and access to justice.

That proposition warrants systematic examination.

The archive provides identifiable starting points for that examination. These include a 15 November 2021 Commonwealth Ombudsman complaint, a 27 March 2023 Federal Court-related public-interest disclosure assessment, a 1 June 2023 NDIS Supported Independent Living decision, a 22 January 2024 NDIS section 100 appeal, an 8 January 2024 Scott Treadwell correspondence file, a 16 October 2024 NSW Trustee & Guardian document, a 14 November 2025 vehicle disposal decision, a 20 November 2025 NDIS plan approval, and a series of November 2025 and January 2026 safeguarding and institutional correspondence records.

The significance of this material lies in the possibility of reconstructing a connected, dated record of what was reported, what evidence was supplied, what decisions were made, what explanations were given, what referrals occurred, and whether any effective remedy followed.

There is, however, an essential distinction between the scale of the archive and the evidentiary status of its contents. A large archive is not automatically proof of a large conspiracy. A government letter may establish that a decision was made without establishing that the decision was unlawful. A complaint establishes that a concern was raised, not that the underlying allegation was proven. A refusal to investigate may warrant scrutiny without constituting proof that the agency knew the allegation was true.

The appropriate conclusion at this stage is therefore:

The documentary material establishes a substantial body of testimony, indexed records, reported institutional engagement and identifiable decisions requiring independent examination. It does not yet establish all the alleged acts of coordination, retaliation, criminal conduct, corruption or deliberate targeting.

That qualification is not a dismissal of the case. It is the foundation for a credible forensic investigation.

2. The source material and the scope of examination

This examination draws on three PDFs supplied directly in this conversation:

- The 35-Year Testimony — The Documentary Record, the Human Betrayal and the Demand for Accountability, dated 1 November 2026.
- The Government Record — Itemised Agency Documents | Barran Dodger, a 24-page register.
- Every Minister Must Now Resign 2, an advocacy and accountability document.

It also draws on the existing 181-page Barran Dodger Dossier and Combined Preservation Volume in the available file library, the publicly accessible GitHub repository, and the published comparative analysis titled The Architecture of Persecution.

These sources perform different functions. The first-person testimony establishes what McLean says happened and identifies the questions he wants investigated. The Government Record is a finding aid. The ministerial appeal advances a political and institutional accountability argument. The 181-page dossier provides a broader catalogue of claims, chronology and verification requirements. The public comparison page supplies historical analogies and claims of comparative significance.

They must not be treated as interchangeable evidence.

2.1 The archive's public scale

The public GitHub repository is identified as public and its visible page reports 1,337 commits. Its directory listing is truncated at 1,000 entries, with 313 entries omitted from that particular display. The repository README reports 5,583 files, including 2,840 PDFs and 1,813 HTML files. It also describes a separate collection of 95 PDFs in docs/official-drive/.

These figures are repository-reported metrics, not an independently audited inventory of the entire repository. They demonstrate the scale of the preservation project as represented by its own public materials. They do not establish that every file is a unique government record or that every file supports the same allegation.

Public repository — Barrandodger

Original archive

Rebuilt archive

2.2 The 657-entry Government Record

The supplied register identifies 657 numbered entries under 24 agency and service categories.

Its largest categories include:

Category	Entries
NDIS / NDIA	122
Commonwealth Ombudsman	80
NCAT / VCAT / Tribunals	58
ASIC / APRA / AFCA / ATO	41
Police — AFP / NSW / Victoria	41
Freedom of Information	39
Housing / Disability Services	36
Comcare / WorkCover / Workers Compensation	33
PM&C / Ministers / MPs	31
Health / Hospitals / Mental Health	27

The first ten categories account for 508 of the 657 entries.

The register's own explanatory wording is particularly important. It includes documents issued on agency letterhead or correspondence sent to agencies and preserved in the archive. Consequently, the 657 entries cannot accurately be described as 657 government decisions or 657 independently established institutional findings.

Some entries represent decisions, some correspondence, some complaints, some responses, and some different copies or stages of a matter. The register is a useful map of the documentary terrain, but the original documents must determine the evidentiary classification of each entry.

2.3 What has not been established by this examination

The public repository's accessible directory listing does not expose every file. Attempts to retrieve the full repository archive and individual GitHub PDF binaries through this working environment have not succeeded. The three supplied PDFs and relevant existing library materials have been examined, but I will not claim to have opened every one of the repository's thousands of files.

I also searched the available file library for Excel workbooks and searched the publicly indexed repository for .xlsx, .xls and .csv material. No relevant spreadsheet was surfaced in those searches. That does not prove that no workbook exists in the truncated repository tree. It means that the claimed Excel-based witness corroboration cannot yet be treated as examined evidence.

This distinction matters because the requested comparison must identify actual witnesses, their original statements, the dates and circumstances of their observations, and whether their accounts independently corroborate specific propositions.

3. The central forensic question: isolated decisions or cumulative institutional failure?

The most important analytical question is whether the documentary history reveals a recurring sequence of administrative events that, considered cumulatively, produced substantial and avoidable harm.

The sequence described in the testimony can be expressed as follows:

- McLean experiences or identifies an event that he believes involves misconduct, neglect, discrimination, financial detriment or a threat to his safety.
- He communicates the concern to a public institution or service provider.
- He supplies correspondence, records, supporting material or a formal complaint.
- The recipient acknowledges, refers, assesses, declines, restricts or otherwise disposes of the matter.
- McLean disputes the response, seeks further records or approaches another institution.
- The original issue remains unresolved from his perspective.
- Further administrative and practical consequences arise while the dispute continues.

The existence of such a sequence would be relevant to questions of procedural fairness, administrative accountability, disability rights and access to effective remedies.

However, the sequence must be demonstrated for each individual issue. A referral by one agency to another does not establish coordination. Five agencies independently receiving correspondence does not establish that they jointly agreed upon an outcome. A repeated classification may result from reliance on a common source, but that source and the actual information-sharing relationship must be identified.

The investigation must establish whether the repeated decisions were genuinely independent, whether one institution's classification was adopted by another, whether an error was propagated, and whether any agency failed to correct information after receiving evidence that challenged it.

This is where the archive may have its greatest evidentiary value.

4. Chronological reconstruction and the institutional record

4.1 The claimed history beginning in 1990

McLean describes his experience as extending over approximately 35 years, beginning with psychiatric involvement in 1990.

The broader dossier records a claim of 14 involuntary psychiatric hospitalisations between 1990 and 2025 involving 13 agencies. The November 2026 testimony separately refers to sixteen psychiatric hospitalisations across three states.

These figures require reconciliation. Fourteen involuntary admissions and sixteen total hospitalisations could represent different categories, but the distinction must be documented. A master admission schedule should identify every hospital, admission date, discharge date, legal status, statutory authority, clinical assessment, review process and outcome.

The 657-entry Government Record, by itself, does not establish a continuous 35-year sequence beginning in 1990. The early period must be substantiated through the original medical, administrative, financial and court records.

The appropriate treatment of the 1990 starting point is therefore: a significant first-person historical claim requiring primary-record verification.

4.2 The 2020–2022 NDIS and oversight sequence

The Government Record identifies a substantial sequence of NDIS, NDIA, provider, employment-classification and oversight correspondence beginning in 2020 and continuing through 2022.

Among the listed matters are:

- A 21 September 2020 NDIS report.
- Multiple NDIS and provider correspondence records during 2021.
- WorkCover and Comcare-related classification issues.
- A 3 June 2021 NDIS Quality and Safeguards Commission-related record described as concerning whether the author was an employee.
- Victorian Ombudsman correspondence.
- OAIC and freedom-of-information material.
- A Commonwealth Ombudsman complaint dated 15 November 2021.
- An IBAC public-interest-disclosure rejection dated 18 November 2021.
- Further 2022 correspondence and review material.

The key issue is not merely the number of records. It is whether the institutions were addressing the same underlying factual issue or different legal questions.

For example, an NDIS provider-registration question, a workers-compensation employment classification, an entitlement to superannuation and a Commonwealth public-interest disclosure may involve overlapping facts but distinct statutory tests.

If an agency used a factual classification originating from another institution, the investigation should identify the source, the date it was adopted, the material supplied to the decision-maker and whether the classification was subsequently reviewed.

4.3 The 2023 public-interest disclosure and NDIS decisions

The 2023 sequence contains several particularly important records:

- 27 March 2023 — Federal Court-related public-interest disclosure assessment.
- 1 June 2023 — NDIA decision declining Supported Independent Living.
- 18 June 2023 — notification concerning a decision not to allocate a disclosure.
- 30 June 2023 — NDIS complaint response.
- 3 July 2023 — statement to the National Anti-Corruption Commission.

- 4 July 2023 — AHRC contact material.

These records should be treated as a connected chronology for examination, but not assumed to concern the same disclosure or the same statutory pathway until their contents establish that connection.

The 27 March document is particularly important. Its legal effect depends on its actual author, institutional capacity, statutory role, assessment scope and wording. A public-interest disclosure assessment is not necessarily a judicial determination. It must not be described as a court finding unless the original record establishes that a court or judge made such a finding.

The June 2023 SIL decision also requires full examination. The reasons for declining support, the assessment evidence, the participant's stated needs, the review rights and the later appeal history are essential to understanding what happened.

4.4 The 2024 Scott Treadwell correspondence and support decisions

The archive identifies correspondence dated 8 January 2024 associated with Scott Treadwell and matters involving the Federal Court, superannuation and the NDIS.

McLean specifically identifies three observations in this correspondence as important to his case, and says that the same letter acknowledges a refusal to protect him.

Those statements must be extracted directly from the original letter before being attributed to Mr Treadwell. The precise language, qualifications and context are essential. An observation by a court officer or employee must also be distinguished from a judicial determination or an admission of liability.

The same year includes:

- A 22 January NDIS section 100 appeal.
- A 14 February NDIS plan approval.
- A 15 March Interim Behaviour Support Plan.
- A 16 October NSW Trustee & Guardian section 122 document.

The existence of an NDIS plan approval is relevant counter-evidence to any absolute assertion that support was never approved. The important question is whether the approved supports were appropriate, sufficient, implemented and actually delivered.

The 2024 material therefore creates an opportunity to compare the written support arrangements with actual service delivery and the subsequent circumstances described in the 2025 and 2026 records.

4.5 The 2025 vehicle, hospital, plan and safeguarding records

The archive identifies a particularly important group of records during November and December 2025:

- 11 and 14 November — Goulburn Hospital CEO briefing documents.
- 14 November — NSW Trustee & Guardian vehicle disposal decision.
- 20 November — NDIS plan approval, identified in the archive as plan number 366406.
- 1 December — Anglicare safety assessment and duty-of-care material.

These records should be examined together because they relate to different dimensions of the same practical circumstances: hospital care, discharge and accommodation, mobility, financial administration, disability funding and provider safeguarding.

The vehicle decision must be assessed against the actual statutory authority, decision-maker, financial-management arrangements, notice, valuation, alternatives, reasons and review rights. Its impact on mobility, accommodation and independence is relevant to the consequences of the decision.

The NDIS approval must be compared with the actual supports delivered. The plan's value does not establish service quality or participant welfare. Equally, an unsatisfactory outcome does not by itself prove that funds were misappropriated.

The Anglicare assessments must be compared with the incident reports, case notes, communications, risk registers and actions taken.

4.6 The 2026 safeguarding and oversight sequence

The January 2026 material identifies accommodation requests, emergency safety assessments, NDIS service-failure correspondence, police-related documents, IGIS/ASIO correspondence, and a Commonwealth Ombudsman service-restriction record.

The later September 2026 material includes NSW Ombudsman correspondence, NDIS Commission complaint acknowledgement and Victorian Ombudsman information.

A complaint acknowledgement proves receipt. A referral proves that a matter was referred. A restriction on further correspondence proves that a particular administrative decision was communicated, if the record is authentic. None of these alone proves that the underlying allegation was established or disproved.

The investigation must identify whether the restrictions or refusals were legally authorised, whether reasons were given, whether alternative review pathways were available, and whether any serious safeguarding information was properly assessed.

5. Disability injustice and the practical consequences of administration

The disability-related material deserves separate treatment rather than being absorbed into the general whistleblower narrative.

The archive identifies a sequence involving NDIS eligibility and planning, SIL decisions, behaviour-support planning, accommodation, service delivery, provider complaints and safeguarding.

The fundamental forensic question is whether the formal supports and decisions translated into real-world independence, safety and dignity.

The inquiry should examine:

- The support needs identified by McLean and the evidence supplied to the NDIA.
- The reasons for the 2023 SIL decline.
- The grounds of the January 2024 section 100 appeal.
- The terms of the February 2024 plan approval.
- The March 2024 Interim Behaviour Support Plan.
- The November 2025 plan approval.
- The service agreements and invoices.
- The support actually delivered and by whom.
- The provider's incident and complaint records.
- The participant's expressed preferences.
- The practical accommodation and safeguarding outcomes.

A plan may allocate substantial funding while a participant continues to experience unsuitable accommodation, inadequate support or an absence of meaningful choice. The financial allocation and the practical outcome must therefore be assessed separately.

The testimony also identifies concerns about Able Point, management accountability, communication, the ability to leave the accommodation, staff conduct and the preservation of incident records.

Those are specific matters capable of documentary examination. The relevant evidence includes occupancy agreements, service agreements, consent records, risk assessments, case notes, incident reports, complaint responses and communications concerning requests to leave.

A provider should be asked to identify the decision-maker responsible for each material decision, the authority relied upon and the practical arrangements available to the participant.

The humanitarian implications should be treated as an independent priority. Food, essential funds, safe accommodation, healthcare, transport, communication and continuity of disability support should not be postponed while historical allegations are investigated.

6. Financial administration, vehicle disposal and identity records

The testimony identifies three distinct financial-administration issues.

First, McLean challenges the arrangements under which NSW Trustee & Guardian exercised authority over aspects of his affairs. The 16 October 2024 section 122 record and the 14 November 2025 vehicle disposal decision are important starting points.

Second, he reports loss of access to Commonwealth Bank online and mobile banking and seeks clarification of who requested or authorised any restriction. This requires the bank's original records, the date and nature of the restriction, the legal authority relied upon, the notification given, the available review process and any alternative arrangements for essential access.

Third, he raises concerns about 123 ABN or business-register records associated with his name and identity. The archive contains an 8 September 2025 business-name extract.

The broader dossier separately contains a claim that more than 350 businesses were fraudulently registered in his name. These are not necessarily the same measure: an ABN, a company registration, a business name and an associated entity are different legal and administrative records. The 123-record concern and the 350-business allegation must not be combined into one count without reconciliation.

A complete reconciliation should identify each ABN or ACN, entity name, registration status, creation date, historical changes, associated persons, source application, authorisation and any correction or objection process.

The financial hardship figures in the testimony are also capable of arithmetic verification. The stated income of $1,371.27 per fortnight less stated outgoings of $1,369.96 produces a difference of $1.31. That calculation is correct on the supplied figures. It does not independently establish the completeness of the budget, the actual account balance or the legal basis of any financial restriction.

The report should therefore distinguish the arithmetic from the underlying financial evidence.

7. Comparative examination against historical whistleblowers

The published comparison page, The Architecture of Persecution, compares McLean's case with nine historical whistleblower cases:

- Daniel Ellsberg — Pentagon Papers.
- Frank Serpico — New York Police Department corruption.
- Karen Silkwood — nuclear industry safety.
- Jeffrey Wigand — tobacco industry disclosures.
- Katharine Gun — GCHQ/NSA surveillance disclosures.
- Thomas Drake — NSA programme and government spending disclosures.
- Chelsea Manning — military records disclosures.
- Edward Snowden — NSA surveillance disclosures.
- Mordechai Vanunu — Israeli nuclear programme disclosures.

The comparison is a potentially useful research framework. It is not, however, independent corroboration of McLean's allegations. These historical witnesses cannot establish that the same events occurred in Australia, that the same mechanisms operated, or that the institutions named in McLean's testimony coordinated their actions.

The comparative page makes several claims of historical uniqueness, including that McLean's archive is the first of its kind to combine state-produced records, blockchain verification and AI corroboration. Such claims require a documented international literature review and comparison with other public archives before they can be stated as established facts. barrandodger.com +2

Vanunu	Amnesty International documented concerns about restrictions imposed around his 2004 release.	That every assertion about long-term surveillance, imprisonment or international legal findings in the comparison page is independently established.

The source material for this comparison includes the Federal Judicial Center's history of the Pentagon Papers case, WNYC's archive of the Knapp Commission hearings, the US Supreme Court's Silkwood judgment, official UK parliamentary and prosecution statements about Katharine Gun, and US Department of Justice records concerning Drake, Manning and Snowden.

7.2 Corrections required in the published comparison

Several passages in the comparison page need correction before it can be relied upon as an academic forensic analysis.

Karen Silkwood: The US Supreme Court case describes her death as occurring in an unrelated automobile accident. The litigation concerned plutonium contamination and damages against Kerr-McGee. The jury's original award was $505,000 in actual damages and $10 million in punitive damages. The case is not a judicial finding of assassination or murder. LII / Legal Information Institute +1

Katharine Gun: The comparison page suggests the prosecution was abandoned because the government did not wish to disclose its legal advice concerning the Iraq War. The Crown Prosecution Service expressly stated that its decision was based on the lack of a realistic prospect of conviction, including the evidential difficulty of disproving a necessity defence. It specifically said the decision had nothing to do with the Attorney-General's advice on the legality of the Iraq War. This is a material factual correction. globalsecurity.org +1

Thomas Drake: The official DOJ record confirms a guilty plea to one misdemeanor count of unauthorised computer access. A comparison that simply says all charges were dropped should be replaced with the precise procedural outcome. United States Department of Justice

Chelsea Manning: The White House's 17 January 2017 order commuted her 35-year sentence to time served plus 120 days. The comparative table must distinguish the original sentence, the commutation, subsequent detention and any later legal issues. - In the general court-marti +1

Frank Serpico: The Knapp Commission was established after the public disclosures of Serpico and David Durk, and it confirmed widespread police corruption. That is an important example of an independent inquiry substantiating a whistleblower's central institutional allegation. It does not independently establish every personal allegation about Serpico's treatment or any connection to McLean's case. WNYC +1

Jeffrey Wigand: His testimony and the historical record provide a documented example of a corporate insider facing legal and professional consequences after disclosing information about the tobacco industry. The US congressional record includes his prepared testimony, and PBS and CBS provide historical accounts of his disclosures and the consequences he described. CBS News +2

7.3 The correct significance of the comparison

The historical cases demonstrate that whistleblower disclosures can expose serious institutional misconduct and that independent investigations sometimes confirm allegations initially disputed by powerful organisations.

They also demonstrate that successful accountability generally depends on more than the whistleblower's own testimony. It requires corroborating records, independent witnesses, investigative powers, a clear chain of evidence and findings that can withstand challenge.

The most relevant precedent for the proposed investigation may be the Knapp Commission: an independent inquiry was established, witnesses gave evidence, investigators developed their own material and institutional findings followed.

That is a stronger model for the McLean investigation than simply asserting that historical cases prove the same conduct happened here.

8. Material inconsistencies and claims requiring reconciliation

A forensic report should not conceal inconsistencies between different versions of the archive. It should identify them, explain why they matter and require a reconciliation schedule.

The following discrepancies are particularly important.

Issue	Versions appearing in the available materials	Required reconciliation

Psychiatric admissions	14 involuntary hospitalisations in the broader dossier; 16 psychiatric hospitalisations in the November 2026 testimony.	Establish the full admission schedule and distinguish involuntary from voluntary admissions.
Business and identity records	More than 350 alleged fraudulent business registrations; a separate concern about 123 ABN/ business-register records.	Distinguish ABNs, ACNs, business names, entities and individual registrations.
Documentary archive	2,301 primary-source documents; 2,304 SHA-256-sealed exhibits; 657 Government Record entries; 5,583 total repository files	Reconcile documents, exhibits, register entries, duplicates, attachments and other repository files.

	reported in the README.
AI analysis	The comparative page claims 15 analyses, 158 testable claims, 88% direct corroboration and zero contradictions; the broader dossier claims 73 analyses and 603 propositions.	Produce the full reports, dates, inputs, methods, model versions and proposition-level results.
Institutional breadth	The comparative page refers to 25+ agencies; the Government Record is grouped under 24 agency/service categories.	Count the actual distinct institutions and distinguish categories from agencies.
Historical duration	A claimed 35-year history beginning in	Locate and authenticate the original records

	1990; the supplied Government Record alone does not establish a complete dated sequence for that period.	for each earlier period.
Employment status	The archive describes conflicting classifications concerning employee, contractor and superannuation status.	Compare the exact decisions and statutory tests, rather than treating all classifications as legally interchangeable.
Financial estimates	Different archive materials contain figures including $8.51 million, $58.6 million, $112.8 million and $257.3 million.	Produce the underlying loss schedule, assumptions, calculations, supporting transactions and independent valuation.

The discrepancies do not necessarily mean that the underlying concerns are false. Some figures may represent different versions, dates, units or scopes. But a master report must state precisely what each number measures.

8.1 The AI corroboration claim

The AI analysis figures deserve particular attention.

The comparison page says that 15 analyses examined 158 testable claims, with 88% direct corroboration and no contradictions. The broader dossier refers to 73 analyses examining 603 propositions.

These results cannot be treated as independent verification without the underlying reports.

A proper audit must establish:

- Whether the original documents were supplied to the AI systems.
- Whether the AI systems examined primary records or earlier AI-generated summaries.
- Whether the same document was counted repeatedly.
- Whether each proposition was tested against supporting and contrary evidence.
- Whether contradictory evidence was actively sought.
- Whether the models were asked to consider alternative explanations.
- Whether human reviewers independently reproduced the conclusions.

An AI system can help identify patterns, extract dates, compare records and expose inconsistencies. It cannot transform an allegation into an established fact simply by returning a consistent answer.

The 181-page dossier itself recognises that the AI results require source documents, prompts, methods, contradiction testing and independent human review.

8.2 The evidentiary inversion claim

One of the most interesting ideas in the archive is the claim that institutions have generated a documentary trail through which their own actions can be assessed.

That proposition is sound as a method of documentary accountability.

However, the comparative page goes further and describes the archive as consisting entirely of state-produced, legally obtained records. The Government Record's own definition includes correspondence sent by McLean to agencies. The archive also contains personal testimony, advocacy, research, AI-generated material and other creator-produced documents.

The report should therefore describe the archive as a mixed-source documentary collection containing agency-originated records, submissions, responses, decisions, personal testimony and analytical material.

This is more accurate and makes the evidence easier to assess.

9. The legal and institutional questions

The following issues should be investigated under the legislation and policies applicable at the date of each event. The report does not presume that a breach occurred merely because a legal framework may be relevant.

9.1 Public-interest disclosure and whistleblower protection

The central questions are:

- What conduct was disclosed?
- To whom was it disclosed?
- What evidence accompanied the disclosure?
- Did the disclosure meet the applicable statutory definition?
- Was the recipient an authorised recipient?
- Was the matter allocated for investigation?
- If not, what statutory basis and reasons were given?
- Were review or reconsideration rights available?
- Was any detriment alleged after the disclosure?
- Is there documentary evidence linking that detriment to the disclosure?

The 2021–2023 correspondence should be reconstructed into a single public-interest disclosure chronology. The 27 March 2023 assessment and the 18 June 2023 non-allocation notification should be read alongside the original disclosure and its supporting documents.

The relevant statutory framework includes the Public Interest Disclosure Act 2013 (Cth). The version in force on the date of each disclosure or decision must be used.

9.2 Disability support and the NDIS

The NDIS strand should be assessed under the National Disability Insurance Scheme Act 2013 and the relevant NDIS Rules as they stood at the relevant dates.

The investigation should examine whether decisions were made using the correct evidence, whether review rights were provided, whether approved supports were implemented and whether complaints were addressed appropriately.

It should also examine the actual services delivered against the funded plan. An approval is not proof of delivery; an invoice is not proof that a service was delivered; a service-provider record is not necessarily proof that the participant received an adequate outcome.

9.3 Financial management and NSW Trustee & Guardian

The 2024 and 2025 NSW Trustee records should be assessed against the applicable statutory authority, orders, powers, duties, notice requirements and review mechanisms.

The questions include:

- What legal authority was operative?
- What powers did it confer?
- Who made each decision?
- What evidence was considered?
- Were the person's wishes and preferences recorded?
- Were less restrictive alternatives considered?
- Were reasons supplied?
- Were review rights communicated?
- What practical consequences followed?

The vehicle disposal decision deserves particular scrutiny because of its reported relationship to mobility, independence, accommodation and the ability to maintain daily living arrangements.

9.4 Freedom of information and transparency

The 39 entries in the Freedom of Information category and the 19 OAIC entries should be consolidated into one access-to-information schedule.

The schedule should identify the request, reference number, date, scope, search terms, decision-maker, reasons, exemptions, documents released, documents withheld, internal review and any external review.
A refusal does not automatically establish concealment. An exemption does not automatically establish a cover-up. But the adequacy of searches, statutory reasons, scope interpretations and review pathways can all be examined.

9.5 Human rights and disability

The Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities provides a relevant international framework for examining autonomy, dignity, liberty, accessibility and equal enjoyment of rights.
The relevant questions include whether the arrangements affecting McLean were consistent with his rights, whether safeguards were effective, and whether he had meaningful access to procedures capable of addressing his concerns.
A finding of a particular treaty breach would require analysis of the facts, Australia's applicable obligations and the relevant legal tests. It cannot be inferred from the existence of distress, a diagnosis, a complaint or an administrative refusal alone.

10. Serious allegations: an independent verification protocol

The testimony includes allegations concerning surveillance, entrapment, electronic interference, threats to kill, possible involvement of security agencies, deliberate targeting and possible attempts to cause physical harm.
These allegations are serious and should be recorded accurately as allegations. They should neither be accepted automatically nor dismissed without examination.
The archive itself identifies material that may be relevant, including police matter documents, IGIS/ASIO correspondence, recordings and the forensic research dossier on patented technologies.
The correct examination would distinguish five stages:
First: the reported experience. What did McLean personally observe, hear, receive or experience?
Second: the contemporaneous record. Is there an original recording, message, police event number, witness statement, medical record, photograph or other record created at the time?
Third: provenance. Can the date, author, device, speaker, recipient and completeness of the material be verified?
Fourth: interpretation. What does the material actually establish, and what alternative explanations remain possible?
Fifth: independent finding. Has a police investigation, court, regulator or other competent body reached a conclusion about the specific conduct?
A patent document may establish that a technology was described or patented. It does not prove that the technology was deployed against a particular person. A request for information to an intelligence oversight body does not establish that the agency conducted surveillance. A police complaint establishes that a report was made, not that every allegation in the report was proven.

The appropriate standard is to test the evidence without either prejudgment or dismissal.

11. Preliminary findings

The following findings are limited to the materials presently examined.

Supported by the available record

Finding 1 — A substantial public documentary archive exists.

The repository is publicly accessible and contains a large collection of documents, correspondence, website materials and preservation records. The repository's reported metrics are not an independent audit, but the archive's existence and public availability are verifiable. wezzo72/Barrandodger: Web · GitHub +1

Finding 2 — The supplied Government Record contains 657 numbered entries across 24 categories.

This is a verifiable property of the supplied register. The entries have mixed evidentiary status and should not all be characterised as government decisions.

Finding 3 — The archive identifies a substantial history of complaints and institutional correspondence.

The register identifies records concerning NDIS, NDIA, Ombudsman, tribunal, FOI, police, health, financial administration, legal assistance and ministerial correspondence. The original records must establish the precise content and outcomes of each pathway.

Finding 4 — There are specific decisions capable of documentary testing.

The NDIS SIL decision, subsequent plan approvals, PID-related assessments, Trustee records, vehicle disposal decision, hospital briefings and provider safeguarding records provide identifiable subjects for an independent investigation.

Requires further verification

Finding 5 — The claimed 35-year pattern requires a complete primary-source chronology.

The testimony identifies 1990 as the beginning of the history. The complete early documentary record must be examined before the entire 35-year period can be treated as established.

Finding 6 — The recurring referral and non-response hypothesis requires pathway reconstruction.

The volume of correspondence warrants examination, but the actual legal and administrative reasons for each referral, closure or refusal must be established.

Finding 7 — The disability-support and financial-administration issues warrant separate scrutiny.

The available material identifies concrete decisions and practical consequences that can be tested against the original plans, service records, financial records and legal instruments.

Finding 8 — The historical whistleblower comparison requires correction and independent sourcing.

Some of its historical comparisons are useful, but several claims require correction or further substantiation. It does not currently establish that McLean's allegations have been independently corroborated by the historical witnesses.

Not established by the material examined

Finding 9 — Coordinated institutional targeting has not been established.

The available register does not by itself prove a common plan, agreement, direction or coordinated intention among the institutions listed.

Finding 10 — Criminal conspiracy, assassination, unlawful surveillance or attempted homicide have not been established.

These allegations require specific primary evidence and, where appropriate, competent investigative findings.

Finding 11 — The claimed global ranking of the case has not been established.

The archive may prove to be unusually extensive in particular respects. A claim that it is the world's most significant whistleblower disability-injustice case would require a systematic comparison with other international cases using independently verifiable measures.

Finding 12 — The claimed AI corroboration rates cannot be treated as independent forensic certification.

The underlying analyses, source material, methods and human verification must be examined.

12. The independent investigation required

The material supports a request for an independent forensic investigation with authority to obtain and examine the relevant primary records.

The investigation should not be controlled solely by the agencies whose conduct is being questioned.

It should have a defined scope and a transparent methodology.

12.1 Phase one — Preservation and authentication

The investigator should obtain a verified snapshot of the public repository, record the Git commit identifier, preserve original files, calculate SHA-256 hashes, identify duplicates and record the source and acquisition date of every item.

No original evidence should be overwritten or silently renamed.

The original archive and all existing hyperlinks should remain intact.

12.2 Phase two — Complete document inventory

Every repository file should be classified by type, date, author, institution, subject and evidentiary status.

PDFs, emails, spreadsheets, photographs, audio, video, HTML and legal documents should be treated according to their respective technical requirements.

The investigator should distinguish agency-originated records from submissions, attachments, working drafts, duplicates and later analytical commentary.

12.3 Phase three — Proposition-by-proposition analysis

Every material allegation should be converted into a testable proposition.

For example:

Proposition	Primary evidence	Corroboration required

	required
A public-interest disclosure was made	Original disclosure and dispatch record	Agency receipt and subsequent correspondence
A disclosure was not allocated	Original decision and reasons	Applicable statutory framework and review history
NDIS SIL was declined	Original NDIA decision	Application, assessment, appeal and later plan
A vehicle was disposed of	Trustee decision and transaction records	Valuation, notice, authority and review documents
Banking access was restricted	Bank's contemporane-ous restriction records	Authority, instructions, notice and review outcome
A death threat was reported	Police event record and original communications	Witnesses, incident chronology and court outcome
A provider failed	Incident reports	Risk

to safeguard	and case notes	assessments, escalation records and corrective action

12.4 Phase four — Independent witness corroboration

The investigation must identify all independent witness material, including any Excel workbook or witness-testimony register that may exist in the public repository.

Each witness should be assessed for:

- Identity and source of knowledge.
- Whether the witness personally observed the event.
- Date and location of the observation.
- Whether the account was contemporaneous.
- Whether the witness gave a signed statement or affidavit.
- Whether the witness has an independent documentary record.
- Whether the witness's account supports a particular proposition.
- Whether the witness has any relationship or interest that must be disclosed.
- Whether another independent source corroborates the account.

A witness who independently observed an event may provide corroboration. A person who merely repeats McLean's account does not independently establish that event.

The same rule applies to AI analyses and media reports.

12.5 Phase five — Contradiction and alternative-explanation testing

The investigator should actively seek evidence that may contradict the allegations, not merely collect material that supports them.

This is essential for credibility.

Each proposition should have an evidence record identifying:

- Supporting evidence.
- Contradictory evidence.
- Missing evidence.
- Alternative explanations.
- Applicable legal test.
- Authentication status.
- Finding and confidence level.

The investigation should use the classifications established, supported but unresolved, disputed, unverified, contradicted and unsupported.

12.6 Phase six — Independent findings and remedies

The final report should identify the relevant institution, decision-maker, legal authority, decision, reasons, any established error, the practical consequence and the remedy available.

It should distinguish institutional maladministration from individual misconduct, civil liability, criminal conduct and ministerial responsibility.

Where evidence establishes a failure, the investigation should identify who had responsibility and what corrective action is warranted.

14. Final assessment: the case that should be put before an independent investigator

The central value of the Barran Dodger archive is its capacity to convert a prolonged personal account into an examinable documentary history.

It identifies specific institutions, specific dates, specific decisions, specific complaint pathways and specific practical consequences. It provides a basis for comparing what was reported with what agencies recorded, what they decided and what they did afterwards.

The disability-related material is especially important because it permits examination of whether the supports and arrangements recorded in administrative systems translated into genuine independence, safety and dignity.

The whistleblower material is important because it permits examination of whether disclosures were handled according to the applicable statutory framework, whether decisions were properly reasoned, whether review rights were accessible and whether any subsequent detriment can be linked to a protected disclosure.

The financial-administration material is important because it permits examination of the authority relied upon, the treatment of assets, the effect of decisions on independence and the availability of meaningful review.

The police, hospital and safeguarding material is important because it permits examination of specific events and the adequacy of the responses made when concerns were reported.

The comparative historical material is important because it places the questions within the broader history of institutional accountability. But historical analogies are not substitutes for proof. The independent corroboration must come from original records and witnesses who can support particular propositions.

The most compelling version of this case will not depend on asserting that every allegation is already proven. It will depend on demonstrating, document by document, where the evidence supports the account, where institutions gave conflicting explanations, where a decision was not adequately justified, where an effective remedy was unavailable, and where the cumulative consequences require investigation.

The investigation should not be confined to asking whether McLean's allegations are true or false in the abstract. It should identify each decision, each responsible institution, each factual proposition, each legal test and each practical consequence.

If the evidence establishes that institutions made errors, those errors should be identified and corrected. If it establishes maladministration, the responsible bodies should be required to answer. If it establishes misconduct, the appropriate authorities should act. If some allegations cannot be substantiated, the reasons should be stated transparently.

The final question is one of democratic accountability: can a citizen assemble a substantial documentary record of decisions affecting his disability support, finances, safety, independence and access to justice, and obtain an independent examination of that record that is not controlled by the very institutions whose conduct he questions?

That is the question this report puts before the relevant institutions.

Preservation first. Examination second. Conclusion last.

Source verification notes

The primary source material and the comparative fact-checks supporting this report include:

- The 35-Year Testimony and Government Record supplied in this conversation.
- The existing dossier's qualification of the 14-admission claim, 350-business allegation, archive metrics and AI corroboration claims.
- The dossier's stated requirements for independent corroboration, contradiction testing and verification of procedural outcomes.
- The historical records concerning Ellsberg, Silkwood, Drake, Manning, Snowden, Gun, Serpico and Wigand. fjc.gov +7

Important outstanding evidence: the Scott Treadwell letter's three observations have not been quoted because the original PDF contents were not retrievable through the public web interface in this examination. The Excel witness material also remains unverified because no workbook was surfaced in the accessible files or indexed repository search. I have not invented either.
