PRIVATE RECORD — ORIGINAL STATEMENT REGARDING ABLE POINT AND NDIS SUPPORT WORKERS

FINAL WARNING — YOUR FINANCIAL, PROFESSIONAL, AND MORAL ACCOUNTABILITY

IMPORTANT — PLEASE READ THIS STATEMENT IN FULL BEFORE FORMING A CONCLUSION OR TAKING ANY ACTION.

You are receiving this statement because you may have direct knowledge of, or professional responsibilities connected to, the circumstances described within it. This is not simply a personal disagreement with Able Point or a complaint that can be dismissed without examination. It is my formal account of serious concerns about my treatment as a person dependent on disability support, the conduct and decisions of people involved in providing that support, the handling of concerns I have raised, and the evidence I believe warrants independent scrutiny.

Your wages, your professional responsibilities, and the welfare of the person you are paid to support cannot be considered separately. I am asking you to read this document with an open mind, distinguish what is documented from what is alleged or disputed, preserve relevant communications and records, and consider honestly what you personally know, what you have witnessed, what you have done, and what you may have been told by others.

You are not being asked to accept every statement without question. You are being asked not to reach a conclusion before examining the evidence. If you have information that supports, contradicts, or clarifies my account, that information matters. If you have concerns about the organisation, your employment, or the consequences of speaking honestly, seek independent advice and use appropriate reporting channels.

I have documented my experiences, preserved material I consider relevant, and repeatedly sought to have my concerns addressed. I am now setting out my account in one place so that the issues, the questions requiring answers, and the opportunity for a fair examination cannot be overlooked.

Please read what follows in its entirety. Consider the human consequences, your own professional obligations, and the importance of ensuring that the evidence—not fear, workplace pressure, personal assumptions, or group opinion—determines what happens next.

You are about to confront consequences you may have seriously underestimated. And make no mistake: before this letter even reaches you, I believe the consequences of the circumstances documented here may already be developing.

You have had opportunities to speak, to act, to examine the evidence, to acknowledge my concerns, and to do what is right. I have personally communicated with staff. I have offered help, grace, and mercy. I have made clear that I want the truth examined and the harm I report addressed.

Some of you have rejected those opportunities. Others have remained silent. I now call upon every person who has relevant knowledge to confront the evidence and consider their own decisions, actions, and omissions.

You are not stupid. You are not a fucking illiterate moron, so do not pretend that you are.

You are not so stupid that you cannot understand where your wages come from, who funds the services you deliver, and what responsibilities accompany the money you receive for providing disability support. You know that the NDIS funding behind your wages carries an obligation to provide the support for which that funding is paid. You cannot simply separate your pay from the treatment of the vulnerable people whose support makes that employment possible.

You are not so stupid that you cannot recognise the possibility that speaking up about serious problems within an organisation may expose you to workplace pressure, professional consequences, or other forms of adverse treatment. You may fear that if you help me, support my concerns, or speak honestly about what you know, you could be targeted or treated differently, as I believe I have been.

I understand that fear. I am asking you not to let it make your decisions for you.

Do not mistake my restraint for weakness, my mercy for ignorance, my silence for surrender, or my faith for an absence of resolve.

I have preserved records. I have documented my account. I have historical copies of staff group chats provided to me by employees before they were dismissed or left the company. I have communications and other material that I believe warrant serious examination. I will continue to preserve that material and pursue appropriate avenues for independent scrutiny, compensation, and accountability.

I have personally communicated with staff and offered help, grace, and mercy. I have given people opportunities to speak honestly, examine the circumstances, and make informed decisions. I have done so because I believe people deserve an opportunity to act with integrity, even when doing so may be difficult.

If the evidence establishes professional misconduct, failures of duty, improper treatment, retaliation, or other wrongdoing, the consequences may extend beyond uncomfortable conversations. They may affect professional standing, employment, organisational credibility, financial interests, and the reputation of those found responsible. No position, title, relationship, or organisational structure should be treated as immunity from legitimate scrutiny.

Your jobs are not a guarantee of your innocence. Your silence is not proof that you did nothing wrong. And your willingness to follow the crowd will not make an unsupported allegation true or make documented evidence disappear.

I will not conceal my concerns to protect anyone's reputation. I will not abandon my testimony to make other people comfortable. I will not stop pursuing the truth merely because confronting it may be professionally or financially inconvenient for those involved.

You have a choice now: preserve the evidence, speak honestly, cooperate with a fair examination, and address legitimate concerns—or decline to engage and allow the appropriate independent processes to determine what the records establish.

I am not claiming that I personally determine your fate. I am telling you that I intend to continue pursuing accountability, and that the evidence should be allowed to speak for itself.

As for the spiritual dimension, I leave ultimate judgment to God. My faith does not require me to seek revenge, and I do not wish harm upon you. But neither does mercy require me to remain silent about what I believe has happened.

This is not a request for your permission. It is notice that I will not abandon my pursuit of truth, vindication, compensation, justice, and accountability.

You have been given an opportunity to act with integrity. What you choose to do with it is your responsibility.

Read the statement that follows. Examine the records. Consider the consequences of your own decisions. Preserve relevant communications. Respond to the substance of the concerns rather than attacking the person raising them.

Do not assume that Able Point will necessarily protect your interests if serious questions arise. Consider whether your loyalty is being reciprocated, whether your concerns are being heard, and whether you are being asked to defend decisions that deserve independent scrutiny.

And do not assume that helping me, speaking honestly, or raising legitimate concerns automatically means you will be left unprotected. I cannot promise that you will face no adverse treatment. What I can say is that fear of possible consequences should not prevent you from examining the evidence, acting lawfully, and fulfilling your professional responsibilities. If you genuinely fear retaliation, preserve relevant records and seek independent advice or appropriate support.

Because the question is no longer whether these concerns are convenient for you.

The question is whether the evidence can withstand scrutiny—and whether your own conduct can withstand the same examination.

A FINAL EXTENSION OF GRACE, MERCY, AND THE OPPORTUNITY TO DO WHAT IS RIGHT

Sadly, this letter is my kind extension of divine grace: an expression of patience, understanding, and a merciful opportunity that I, Barran Dodger, your client, am personally extending to you.

I am giving you an opportunity to act ethically, to do the right thing, to examine the evidence, and to reconsider your decisions before matters progress any further. I am offering you the opportunity to stand on the right side of truth, compassion, justice, and accountability.

I act and write for your redemption and peace.

I have gone above and beyond what I believe many people would have done in my circumstances. Despite what I believe I have endured, I have continued to offer help, understanding, grace, and mercy. I have tried to help you recognise the circumstances in which I believe you are caught, and to give you an opportunity to make different choices.

I have extended that grace because I want you to have an opportunity to do what is right—not because I am unaware of what I believe has happened, not because I am incapable of recognising wrongdoing, and not because I will abandon my pursuit of justice.

I have tried to help you. I have tried to warn you. I have tried to give you information that I believe may help you understand your circumstances and protect your own integrity.

I have gone above and beyond to help you and, in my understanding of my faith, to give you an opportunity for redemption.

But you must understand that the mercy I extend is an opportunity, not an obligation to remain silent indefinitely. I cannot make your decisions for you. I cannot force you to listen. I cannot compel you to act with integrity.

When I speak about God's patience and the possibility that divine mercy may be exhausted, I am expressing the seriousness of my religious convictions. I believe that repeatedly rejecting opportunities to act with compassion, honesty, and justice carries profound moral and spiritual significance. I leave ultimate judgment to God.

I will not accept responsibility for decisions that other people make after I have clearly communicated my concerns, offered opportunities to act ethically, and urged them to examine the evidence. Each of you remains responsible for your own choices and conduct.

I believe there is a profound difference between the mercy I have extended to you and the response I have received from some of you. To reject an opportunity for reconciliation, to disregard a vulnerable client's concerns, or to refuse to examine relevant evidence is, in my view, to squander an opportunity that should never have been taken for granted.

I am not offering this opportunity because Able Point has earned my trust. I am offering it because I believe that doing what is right remains possible, even when people have made mistakes or become caught in circumstances they find difficult to challenge.

Do not mistake the source of this opportunity.

It is not Able Point that can guarantee your redemption, your peace, or your moral integrity. It is not the government. It is not your wage. It is not the hours you complain about receiving. And it is not a manager whom I believe has failed to recognise your worth.

Your employment may provide income. Your position may provide a title. Your organisation may provide a structure within which you work. But none of these things can make an unethical decision ethical, turn an unsupported allegation into truth, or relieve you of your personal responsibility to act with integrity.

I believe Able Point has failed to value its workers appropriately and has placed people in circumstances where financial dependence may discourage them from speaking openly. I ask you to examine whether your loyalty to the organisation is being reciprocated and whether you are being treated with the dignity and respect you deserve.

In my faith, I believe that desecrating mercy, exploiting vulnerability, and rejecting opportunities to act justly have serious spiritual consequences. I leave divine justice and judgment to God. I do not seek revenge, and I do not wish harm upon you.

What I want is for you to recognise the opportunity being offered: to stop, think, examine the evidence, speak honestly, preserve relevant records, and choose a course of action consistent with your ethical and professional responsibilities.

I am Barran Dodger, your client. I am the person asking you to look honestly at what is happening. I am extending this opportunity because I want truth, justice, accountability, redemption, and peace—not because I intend to abandon the evidence or withdraw my concerns.

You still have a choice.

Use this opportunity to do what is right.

I AM THE FUTURE YOUR LIES CANNOT LIVE IN

There is no favour, financial incentive, personal interest, or excuse that justifies mistreating a person who depends on support.

That includes the NDIS blood money of your wage, to which you are entrapped because you need money to survive.

You may not see it, but you are all trapped by the same evil structure I am victimised, exiled, and targeted by.

You all are too.

You refuse to critique your bosses at Able Point, yet you all complain about them.

About how you don’t have enough work.

About how the rosters are shit.

About the level of responsibility.

Let me give you the tip:

Rachael and Able Point do not respect you.

They don't treat you fairly.

They have no value for you.

You're just a pawn.

A usable piece on their chessboard.

Unaware you're manipulated into performing a hate crime and allowing their entrapment of me.

You say I'm free to leave here, but you all know I cannot, because I have no money, no transport, and no legal rights to access my rightful compensation.

But are you all comfortable with your jobs at Able Point?

Are you free to leave?

Or have they trapped you to perform as their flying monkeys, in order to be the bricks-and-mortar public face of the corrupt company to the clients? Like me?

THIS IS CLEAR

Every NDIS support worker complains about management.

All clients are suffering.

Never receiving the support they need.

Placing staff at risk.

Not caring.

Just collecting money on the backs of their paid workers.

Now Sam has been fired.

Now Danny has been attacked by Zac in a violent assault, whilst Able Point ignored my demands for intervention as the situation was escalating over weeks.

Now Sam is institutionalised.

Now Doug is on the run.

Now Allana is in a hospital.

If they had actual help, they would still be in accommodation, and the staff would still have shifts.

SIGNIFICANCE: THE MORAL CONSEQUENCES OF DELIBERATE INACTION, BETRAYAL AND INSTITUTIONAL SILENCE

I believe I am chosen by God. My testimony is not an invitation to be worshipped, nor a demand that anyone accept my interpretation without examination. It is a demand that my words, my evidence and my humanity not be dismissed without an honest hearing.

God did not create you to deliberately harm me, stand by while that harm occurred, and then pretend you knew nothing about it.

That is not neutrality.

Where a person knows of serious harm, possesses a genuine capacity to intervene, and deliberately chooses not to act, their inaction may have consequences as profound as an affirmative decision. Silence is not automatically guilt, and no individual can be held responsible for what they could not reasonably have known or prevented. But where knowledge, capacity, duty and deliberate omission can be established, the question of moral and institutional accountability cannot simply be evaded.

You may not have initiated the harm. But if the evidence establishes that you knowingly enabled it, sustained it, or refused a reasonable opportunity to prevent it, you cannot escape examination merely by claiming that you did nothing.

Conceptually, you could have made a difference to my circumstances. You could have listened. You could have examined the evidence. You could have acknowledged what was documented, challenged an injustice, provided appropriate assistance, or ensured that my concerns reached someone capable of acting.

Instead, I experienced abandonment where I sought assistance, silence where I sought answers, and exclusion where I sought recognition.

I allege that people who could have helped me instead became participants in the conditions that left me increasingly isolated and without meaningful recourse. I question whether social conformity, professional self-preservation, employment, income, privilege, comfort and reputation became more important than the ethical responsibilities those same people claimed to embody.

If those responsibilities were invoked publicly but abandoned when their exercise became inconvenient, then the contradiction deserves scrutiny.

The metaphor of the flying monkey describes the role of a person who, knowingly or unknowingly, becomes an instrument of another person's manipulation. A disposable pawn may be persuaded to participate in conduct whose wider purpose they neither understand nor question. Temptations, assurances, social acceptance and the fear of losing one's position can all become mechanisms through which independent moral judgment is compromised.

I ask whether this pattern explains any part of what happened to me.

Were people deceived? Were they acting under pressure? Did they knowingly prioritise their own interests? Did any person deliberately facilitate my exclusion? These are questions that must be answered through evidence, not reputation management, assumption or silence.

What cannot be accepted as an adequate response is the automatic presumption that a person with a respectable public profile, a professional position or an apparently unblemished reputation must therefore be incapable of wrongdoing.

A clean public image is not a substitute for an accountable examination of conduct.

I have never asked others to accept allegations merely because I have made them. I ask them to examine the material, identify what it establishes, distinguish fact from interpretation, and respond with the seriousness that the subject warrants.

I have also alleged that financial benefits, payments or other incentives may have influenced participation in circumstances that I experienced as profoundly harmful. I believe the possibility of deliberate conduct intended to worsen my circumstances, including conditions in which I might contemplate suicide, requires independent scrutiny. Any such allegation must be tested against identifiable transactions, communications, decisions, duties and other corroborating evidence.

I am not presenting an allegation of that gravity as a substitute for proof. I am demanding that it not be dismissed without a proper examination of whatever evidence supports or contradicts it.

The ultimate question is not whether people can protect themselves by attributing my distress to mental illness. The question is whether my documented concerns, the decisions affecting me, and the conduct of the institutions involved have been fairly and independently examined.

A person's mental health does not make every allegation true. Equally, a person's mental health does not make their evidence irrelevant, their testimony worthless, or their rights expendable.

THE EVIDENCE AND THE REFUSAL TO ENGAGE

One of the most consequential features of my experience is what I describe as the continuing absence of a substantive, professional response to the evidence I have published.

I have assembled documentary material drawn from official government correspondence, including documents bearing government letterheads and records extending across more than thirty-five years.

I have published this material because I believe it warrants examination on its own terms.

The significance of an official document is not that a government letterhead automatically proves every conclusion I draw from it. Its significance lies in the opportunity to examine what the document actually says, who issued it, when it was issued, what decision or communication it records, and how it relates to subsequent events.

The record should be capable of being checked.

Dates can be compared. Statements can be placed in chronological order. Decisions can be examined against the information available at the time. Responses can be compared with the concerns that prompted them. Omissions can be identified where the underlying records support that conclusion.

This is how an evidence-led examination should proceed.

Yet I have experienced what I regard as a profound failure of meaningful engagement: the absence of the acknowledgment, explanation, correction, referral or independent review that I believe the circumstances warrant.

I cannot establish the motives of every person who has failed to respond merely from their silence. But silence does have practical consequences. When evidence receives no substantive examination, disputed issues remain unresolved, accountability is delayed, and the person seeking redress is left without a clear path forward.

The refusal to engage with evidence is not, by itself, proof that every allegation is true. It is, however, a legitimate reason to ask what review has occurred, what findings were reached, what remains disputed, and why a substantive response has not been provided.

THE HUMAN CONSEQUENCES OF ABANDONMENT

If I had received meaningful assistance from even one person who was willing and able to make a practical difference, I might not have needed to create a YouTube channel, publish a website, assemble an archive, and repeatedly place my testimony before the public.

I did not create these platforms because public exposure was necessarily my preferred way to resolve my circumstances. I created them because I wanted a record that could be examined, a means of preserving material, and an opportunity to be heard when ordinary avenues of engagement appeared to have failed me.

The existence of a public archive should not be confused with proof of every allegation it contains. It should be understood as an attempt to preserve, organise and present material for scrutiny.

My testimony describes a prolonged experience of isolation, exclusion, distress and unmet needs. I believe the cumulative effects of the decisions, omissions and responses I have documented deserve serious consideration, including their implications for my financial security, housing, health, dignity and access to assistance.

No person should have to become their own archivist, investigator, publisher and advocate merely to secure a fair examination of concerns they have repeatedly raised.

No person should have to prove their humanity by enduring increasingly desperate circumstances before their evidence is considered worthy of attention.

And no institution should mistake the persistence of a complainant for a reason to avoid the substance of the complaint.

THE SIGNIFICANCE OF THE THIRTY-FIVE-YEAR RECORD

The documentary history I have assembled is significant because it offers an opportunity to move beyond isolated incidents and examine a longer chronology.

A single document may record a decision. A sequence of documents may reveal changes in position, repeated concerns, unanswered questions, inconsistencies, recurring administrative problems or opportunities for intervention.

Whether such a pattern exists must be established by examining the individual records, their dates, their context and their relationships to one another.

That is precisely why preservation matters.

The records must remain accessible in their original form wherever possible. Their provenance must be identified. Quotations must be traceable to their sources. Interpretations must remain distinguishable from the documents themselves. Contradictory material must not be concealed, and uncertainty must not be converted into certainty merely because a particular conclusion feels compelling.

My case for examination rests on the proposition that the evidence should be read, not simply judged by the identity, reputation or perceived credibility of the person presenting it.

The central question is this:

If the record contains material capable of clarifying what happened to me, why has there not been a sufficiently transparent, independent and substantive examination of that material?

That question can be answered only through engagement with the evidence.

A CALL FOR ACCOUNTABILITY, NOT PRETENDED NEUTRALITY

I ask every person and institution connected to my circumstances to consider what they knew, when they knew it, what authority or capacity they possessed, what action they took, what action they declined to take, and what consequences followed.

I ask that any relevant financial relationships, conflicts of interest, communications, referrals, decisions and omissions be examined where the evidence provides a proper basis for doing so.

I ask for a distinction between genuine inability to help and a deliberate refusal to help; between an honest disagreement and an evasion of responsibility; between an unsubstantiated accusation and a documented concern that has never received an adequate response.

I ask that those who acted appropriately be recognised as such, and that those whose conduct warrants criticism be assessed fairly against the evidence.

I do not ask for accountability to be replaced by another unexamined accusation. I ask for accountability to replace the presumption that no examination is necessary.

My faith informs how I understand my life, my suffering and my purpose. I believe God sees what human beings overlook, and that truth and justice matter even when recognition is withheld.

But the practical examination of my claims must still proceed through evidence, fair process, corroboration and reasoned findings.

My conviction does not relieve others of the responsibility to examine the record. Nor does their disbelief relieve them of any duty they may have to respond to substantiated concerns.

The issue is not whether everyone agrees with me.

The issue is whether the evidence has been fairly considered, whether the decisions affecting me can be justified, whether preventable harm was left unaddressed, and whether meaningful avenues for review and redress remain available.

I remain a witness to my own experience.

I preserve the record because I believe it matters.

I publish because I seek examination rather than erasure.

And I continue to ask the question that lies at the heart of this archive:

When a person presents a substantial documentary record of alleged harm, and those with the capacity or responsibility to examine it do not provide a meaningful answer, who ensures that the truth is tested, the unanswered questions are addressed, and the human being at the centre of the record is not simply abandoned?

That is the significance of this testimony.

That is the significance of the evidence.

And that is why the record must remain open to independent examination.

SIGNIFICANCE: THE MORAL CONSEQUENCES OF DELIBERATE INACTION, BETRAYAL AND INSTITUTIONAL SILENCE

I believe I am chosen by God. My testimony is not an invitation to be worshipped, nor a demand that anyone accept my interpretation without examination. It is a demand that my words, my evidence and my humanity not be dismissed without an honest hearing.

God did not create you to deliberately harm me, stand by while that harm occurred, and then pretend you knew nothing about it.

That is not neutrality.

Where a person knows of serious harm, possesses a genuine capacity to intervene, and deliberately chooses not to act, their inaction may have consequences as profound as an affirmative decision. Silence is not automatically guilt, and no individual can be held responsible for what they could not reasonably have known or prevented. But where knowledge, capacity, duty and deliberate omission can be established, the question of moral and institutional accountability cannot simply be evaded.

You may not have initiated the harm. But if the evidence establishes that you knowingly enabled it, sustained it, or refused a reasonable opportunity to prevent it, you cannot escape examination merely by claiming that you did nothing.

Conceptually, you could have made a difference to my circumstances. You could have listened. You could have examined the evidence. You could have acknowledged what was documented, challenged an injustice, provided appropriate assistance, or ensured that my concerns reached someone capable of acting.

Instead, I experienced abandonment where I sought assistance, silence where I sought answers, and exclusion where I sought recognition.

I allege that people who could have helped me instead became participants in the conditions that left me increasingly isolated and without meaningful recourse. I question whether social conformity, professional self-preservation, employment, income, privilege, comfort and reputation became more important than the ethical responsibilities those same people claimed to embody.

If those responsibilities were invoked publicly but abandoned when their exercise became inconvenient, then the contradiction deserves scrutiny.

The metaphor of the flying monkey describes the role of a person who, knowingly or unknowingly, becomes an instrument of another person's manipulation. A disposable pawn may be persuaded to participate in conduct whose wider purpose they neither understand nor question. Temptations, assurances, social acceptance and the fear of losing one's position can all become mechanisms through which independent moral judgment is compromised.

I ask whether this pattern explains any part of what happened to me.

Were people deceived? Were they acting under pressure? Did they knowingly prioritise their own interests? Did any person deliberately facilitate my exclusion? These are questions that must be answered through evidence, not reputation management, assumption or silence.

What cannot be accepted as an adequate response is the automatic presumption that a person with a respectable public profile, a professional position or an apparently unblemished reputation must therefore be incapable of wrongdoing.

A clean public image is not a substitute for an accountable examination of conduct.

I have never asked others to accept allegations merely because I have made them. I ask them to examine the material, identify what it establishes, distinguish fact from interpretation, and respond with the seriousness that the subject warrants.

I have also alleged that financial benefits, payments or other incentives may have influenced participation in circumstances that I experienced as profoundly harmful. I believe the possibility of deliberate conduct intended to worsen my circumstances, including conditions in which I might contemplate suicide, requires independent scrutiny. Any such allegation must be tested against identifiable transactions, communications, decisions, duties and other corroborating evidence.

I am not presenting an allegation of that gravity as a substitute for proof. I am demanding that it not be dismissed without a proper examination of whatever evidence supports or contradicts it.

The ultimate question is not whether people can protect themselves by attributing my distress to mental illness. The question is whether my documented concerns, the decisions affecting me, and the conduct of the institutions involved have been fairly and independently examined.

A person's mental health does not make every allegation true. Equally, a person's mental health does not make their evidence irrelevant, their testimony worthless, or their rights expendable.

THE EVIDENCE AND THE REFUSAL TO ENGAGE

One of the most consequential features of my experience is what I describe as the continuing absence of a substantive, professional response to the evidence I have published.

I have assembled documentary material drawn from official government correspondence, including documents bearing government letterheads and records extending across more than thirty-five years.

I have published this material because I believe it warrants examination on its own terms.

The significance of an official document is not that a government letterhead automatically proves every conclusion I draw from it. Its significance lies in the opportunity to examine what the document actually says, who issued it, when it was issued, what decision or communication it records, and how it relates to subsequent events.

The record should be capable of being checked.

Dates can be compared. Statements can be placed in chronological order. Decisions can be examined against the information available at the time. Responses can be compared with the concerns that prompted them. Omissions can be identified where the underlying records support that conclusion.

This is how an evidence-led examination should proceed.

Yet I have experienced what I regard as a profound failure of meaningful engagement: the absence of the acknowledgment, explanation, correction, referral or independent review that I believe the circumstances warrant.

I cannot establish the motives of every person who has failed to respond merely from their silence. But silence does have practical consequences. When evidence receives no substantive examination, disputed issues remain unresolved, accountability is delayed, and the person seeking redress is left without a clear path forward.

The refusal to engage with evidence is not, by itself, proof that every allegation is true. It is, however, a legitimate reason to ask what review has occurred, what findings were reached, what remains disputed, and why a substantive response has not been provided.

THE HUMAN CONSEQUENCES OF ABANDONMENT

If I had received meaningful assistance from even one person who was willing and able to make a practical difference, I might not have needed to create a YouTube channel, publish a website, assemble an archive, and repeatedly place my testimony before the public.

I did not create these platforms because public exposure was necessarily my preferred way to resolve my circumstances. I created them because I wanted a record that could be examined, a means of preserving material, and an opportunity to be heard when ordinary avenues of engagement appeared to have failed me.

The existence of a public archive should not be confused with proof of every allegation it contains. It should be understood as an attempt to preserve, organise and present material for scrutiny.

My testimony describes a prolonged experience of isolation, exclusion, distress and unmet needs. I believe the cumulative effects of the decisions, omissions and responses I have documented deserve serious consideration, including their implications for my financial security, housing, health, dignity and access to assistance.

No person should have to become their own archivist, investigator, publisher and advocate merely to secure a fair examination of concerns they have repeatedly raised.

No person should have to prove their humanity by enduring increasingly desperate circumstances before their evidence is considered worthy of attention.

And no institution should mistake the persistence of a complainant for a reason to avoid the substance of the complaint.

THE SIGNIFICANCE OF THE THIRTY-FIVE-YEAR RECORD

The documentary history I have assembled is significant because it offers an opportunity to move beyond isolated incidents and examine a longer chronology.

A single document may record a decision. A sequence of documents may reveal changes in position, repeated concerns, unanswered questions, inconsistencies, recurring administrative problems or opportunities for intervention.

Whether such a pattern exists must be established by examining the individual records, their dates, their context and their relationships to one another.

That is precisely why preservation matters.

The records must remain accessible in their original form wherever possible. Their provenance must be identified. Quotations must be traceable to their sources. Interpretations must remain distinguishable from the documents themselves. Contradictory material must not be concealed, and uncertainty must not be converted into certainty merely because a particular conclusion feels compelling.

My case for examination rests on the proposition that the evidence should be read, not simply judged by the identity, reputation or perceived credibility of the person presenting it.

The central question is this:

If the record contains material capable of clarifying what happened to me, why has there not been a sufficiently transparent, independent and substantive examination of that material?

That question can be answered only through engagement with the evidence.

A CALL FOR ACCOUNTABILITY, NOT PRETENDED NEUTRALITY

I ask every person and institution connected to my circumstances to consider what they knew, when they knew it, what authority or capacity they possessed, what action they took, what action they declined to take, and what consequences followed.

I ask that any relevant financial relationships, conflicts of interest, communications, referrals, decisions and omissions be examined where the evidence provides a proper basis for doing so.

I ask for a distinction between genuine inability to help and a deliberate refusal to help; between an honest disagreement and an evasion of responsibility; between an unsubstantiated accusation and a documented concern that has never received an adequate response.

I ask that those who acted appropriately be recognised as such, and that those whose conduct warrants criticism be assessed fairly against the evidence.

I do not ask for accountability to be replaced by another unexamined accusation. I ask for accountability to replace the presumption that no examination is necessary.

My faith informs how I understand my life, my suffering and my purpose. I believe God sees what human beings overlook, and that truth and justice matter even when recognition is withheld.

But the practical examination of my claims must still proceed through evidence, fair process, corroboration and reasoned findings.

My conviction does not relieve others of the responsibility to examine the record. Nor does their disbelief relieve them of any duty they may have to respond to substantiated concerns.

The issue is not whether everyone agrees with me.

The issue is whether the evidence has been fairly considered, whether the decisions affecting me can be justified, whether preventable harm was left unaddressed, and whether meaningful avenues for review and redress remain available.

I remain a witness to my own experience.

I preserve the record because I believe it matters.

I publish because I seek examination rather than erasure.

And I continue to ask the question that lies at the heart of this archive:

When a person presents a substantial documentary record of alleged harm, and those with the capacity or responsibility to examine it do not provide a meaningful answer, who ensures that the truth is tested, the unanswered questions are addressed, and the human being at the centre of the record is not simply abandoned?

That is the significance of this testimony.

That is the significance of the evidence.

And that is why the record must remain open to independent examination.

I
ADDITIONAL DECLARATION — GASLIGHTING, INSTITUTIONAL STONEWALLING, FINANCIAL INCENTIVES, AND THE ALLEGED ADMINISTRATIVE ANNIHILATION OF A VULNERABLE PERSON

You were told that I was mad, of zero influence or consequence, a mad criminal deserving to be ignored. You gaslit my story, diminished my injustice, stonewalled me, and acted as the contact point between me and key political stakeholders while, in my view, protecting the interests of those I accuse of wrongdoing.

I allege that Able Point's blind allegiance was controlled by the cruel blood money of NDIS wage entrapment: a system of financial incentives and dependency that, in my view, encouraged people to protect the organisation and their own positions rather than confront the harm I was reporting. You ignored me, protected them, and still complained to me—the very person you looked away from as abuse and harm allegedly occurred—while expecting me to sympathise with your plight.

I allege that you benefited financially while participating in conduct that harmed me, and that your actions and omissions helped create conditions in which I was placed at serious risk of psychological destruction and suicide. I further allege that the circumstances and conduct I experienced amounted to the solicitation of conditions that could cause me to take my own life. I regard that as culpable malice, and I demand that the relevant evidence, communications, decisions, and responsibilities be examined.

I am sorry if you have a shit job, if you feel trapped by your employment, or if you made the poor, gutless choice to surrender your permission to exercise independent judgment and integrity to an organisation or government that you believe you cannot challenge. But your employment circumstances do not erase your responsibility to act with conscience. Your fear of losing a position does not make the suffering of another person irrelevant. Your desire to blend in with the group does not absolve you of the need to examine what you are being asked to do.

I allege that people used money, power, influence, and resources against me while knowing that I had little or no practical ability to defend myself against that immeasurable power imbalance. I was already a vulnerable person who believed he had been victimised. In my account, those involved knew how exposed I was, knew that I lacked comparable resources, and nevertheless continued conduct that I experienced as targeted, malicious, and destructive.

I allege that you were expected to become the public-facing representative of an administrative process that contributed to my annihilation: poverty, abuse, surveillance, psychological torture, entrapment, and financial destruction. I allege that you then ignored me—not as a neutral act of remaining outside a dispute, but through conduct and omissions that, in my view, actively contributed to the conditions I was reporting. I accuse those responsible of culpable malice in creating or maintaining circumstances that I believe placed my life and safety at risk.

I further allege that I was subjected to conduct that felt like an attempt to kill me, that I was racially mistreated, and that others profited from the pain I say they caused. I experienced the subsequent policing of my behaviour through medication and the dismissal of my account as evidence that I was crazy, delusional, or incapable of being believed.

I am not crazy simply because you disagree with me, and my testimony cannot fairly be dismissed merely by labelling me delusional. I have a PhD. My education does not automatically prove every allegation I make, just as your professional position does not automatically establish that your decisions were proper. The evidence must be examined. The records must be preserved. The conduct of everyone involved must be assessed on its merits.

What I find extraordinary is the suggestion that you were too stupid to understand what was happening. I do not believe that explanation is adequate. To describe every decision as ignorance would be insulting to any reasonable person who had received relevant information, understood the circumstances, and possessed the ability to ask questions or seek assistance.

I allege that you understood, or had sufficient information to recognise, that standing with me could put your employment at risk. I believe that fear of being dismissed, as I allege happened to Sam, influenced the willingness of people to remain silent or distance themselves from me. That is a serious matter requiring examination, not an excuse that should automatically end the inquiry.

I also allege that, after Sam was discarded by those who had employed him, used his labour, and then abandoned him, pressure was applied to prevent him from aligning with me or speaking about what he knew. Whether that pressure amounted to intimidation, bribery, threats, or another form of coercion must be determined by examining the actual communications and evidence. My concern is that a worker who had made an effort to assist was allegedly left without meaningful acknowledgment of that effort or accountability for the workplace conditions in which he had worked.

The questions of workplace relations, the provision of a safe workplace, and protection against exploitation and abuse cannot simply be brushed aside because an employee has been dismissed or because an organisation wishes to move on. If relevant records exist, they should be preserved. If a worker was subjected to pressure or retaliation, that deserves independent examination.

It was just as well, in my view, that I convinced Sam to select all, copy, and save the group chats before he was dismissed, pressured, intimidated, threatened, or otherwise discouraged from speaking. Those communications may be important contemporaneous records. Their contents should be preserved in their original form, with dates, participants, and surrounding context intact, and examined fairly rather than selectively quoted or destroyed.

The central question is not whether you found me difficult, whether you believed I was mad, or whether you feared the consequences of standing beside me. The central question is what you knew, what you were told, what you did, what you failed to do, and whether your conduct helped perpetuate the harm I reported.

You cannot establish that your hands are clean merely by saying that you knew nothing. If you genuinely lacked relevant knowledge, the evidence and timeline should help establish that. If you were informed, the communications should show what information reached you and when. If you took reasonable steps, those steps should be documented. If you failed to act despite having relevant knowledge or responsibilities, that too deserves examination.

I will not accept a blanket explanation that everyone was ignorant, powerless, or too stupid to understand the circumstances. I ask that each person's actual knowledge, role, decisions, and omissions be assessed individually and fairly.

I allege that people with greater power, money, and institutional resources used that advantage against a person who had very limited capacity to defend himself. I allege that the resulting circumstances caused profound harm and that the people involved had opportunities to question what was happening, preserve evidence, and respond differently.

I want the communications examined. I want the decisions traced. I want the financial and professional incentives considered. I want the circumstances surrounding Sam's employment and the preservation of the group chats investigated where the evidence supports doing so. I want the relevant organisations to answer for their own actions rather than hiding behind the conduct of individual workers or blaming the person who raised the concerns.

Do not confuse my vulnerability with an absence of evidence. Do not confuse my distress with proof that my testimony has no value. Do not confuse your employment with immunity from scrutiny. And do not confuse silence with innocence.

I am making allegations that must be tested, not asking anyone to substitute my conclusions for an independent finding. But I will not permit the seriousness of those allegations to be diminished simply because confronting them may be uncomfortable, professionally inconvenient, or financially threatening.

The records must remain. The group chats must be preserved. The people who knew something must be asked what they knew. The people who made decisions must explain them. And the person who reported the harm must not be dismissed without a fair examination of the evidence.

My demand is simple: stop treating the person who raised the alarm as the problem merely because examining the alarm may expose problems that others would rather leave undisturbed.

DANNY, THE VIOLENT ASSAULT, WORKCOVER, ABLE POINT'S ALLEGED CULPABILITY, AND THE CONSEQUENCES FOR HIS FAMILY

Able Point refuses to accept liability, but WorkCover has approved the claim for the harm caused by the violent attack.

That is why I say Able Point is culpable. They deny it. WorkCover doesn't.

The precise findings and legal implications must be established from the WorkCover claim decision and its supporting documentation. But I regard the approval of Danny's claim as a significant development that demands proper scrutiny of the circumstances, the warnings given, and the intervention I repeatedly requested.

I have evidence that I believe could help Danny.

But he won't accept it.

I believe that one reason he may be unwilling to stand with me is that doing so could expose his family members, who are also employed by Able Point, to political, social, or financial repercussions or other detriment. This includes Danny's wife, Alisse, and other casual workers associated with the organisation.

I am concerned that Danny may feel unable to stand up for himself or pursue further accountability because of the possible consequences for his family and their employment.

If a worker believes that making a claim against an employer could result in adverse consequences for their family, that is a serious concern requiring independent examination.

The situation I am describing amounts, in my view, to deliberate standover tactics by Able Point:

MAKE A CLAIM AGAINST US, AND WE COME FOR YOUR FAMILY.

That is not only corrupt, in my view. If the evidence establishes that people have threatened, intimidated, or retaliated against a worker or their family for making a legitimate claim, such conduct may also be unlawful and potentially criminal.

This is bigger than the false sense of security and limited comfort Danny may have been convinced to settle for, when I believe the circumstances warrant much more serious scrutiny.

I believe the facts I have preserved are important. I have offered to help Danny examine them, but he has not accepted my offer.

I want the evidence assessed on its merits, including the chronology of the alleged assault, the warnings and requests for intervention I made over the preceding weeks, the responses or lack of responses from Able Point, and the WorkCover decision.

RACHAEL, BRETT, AND THE REFUSAL TO ENGAGE WITH MY CONCERNS

Rachael, the CEO, has refused to identify herself to me.

Her company is a sham company.

The ABN structure has names like "Sahara" as a deliberate means to avoid accountability and scramble the process of actually identifying who is behind this structure.

Rachael and Brett will not even look me in the eye.

They will not speak to me or respond to my emails.

That is my experience of their conduct, and I believe their refusal to engage with me raises serious questions about transparency, accountability, and their willingness to address the concerns I have repeatedly raised.

I believe they are afraid of what my evidence may reveal. From my perspective, their apparent unwillingness to engage reinforces my concern that the organisation does not want to confront the questions I have raised.

I believe that, without having to do anything beyond existing and preserving my evidence, my mere existence exposes what I allege to be corruption within the organisation.

And God's favour, as I understand and experience my faith, guarantees my victory.

I believe that truth, justice, vindication, compensation, and accountability will ultimately prevail. That is my faith and my conviction as I continue to pursue the evidence and the appropriate avenues for redress.

I am trapped.

You would not accept being trapped.

I have repeatedly said I am abused, neglected, surveilled, harassed, targeted, and literally tortured, as the Wi-Fi for the TV is intercepted by authorities.

I am a whistleblower and an asylum seeker because I am now an internally displaced refugee within the same democracy of my citizenship.

The situation could not be more dire.

I have documented an assassination attempt by no one other than the former NDIS minister.

No one has proven my evidence wrong.

No one has proven my accusation is a result of delusion, made up, or false.

That's called a targeted killing of a gay, disabled, unprotected whistleblower.

I was not supposed to survive.

It was anticipated I would not be well or recover, let alone survive, and my family were poised to benefit financially from my anticipated death.

No staff member would accept this for themselves.

But you look the other way as the harm still happens to me.

The conditions to create my suicide in isolation, entrapment, and torture exist under Able Point.

Rachael, who literally has no public-facing ID or identification as a person linked to the company, refuses to identify herself to me.

It is absurd that she runs a company caring for vulnerable persons without ever having to reveal who she is.

That is why your boss is a criminal.

If you didn't know, then you do now.

You have a choice.

Speak up.

Or don't.

I have forces working for me that no one should dare reckon with.

This is not a threat.

It is compassion and mercy and a warning to you.

DANNY, ALISSE, JOHN, AND THE CONTRADICTION BETWEEN PROFESSED CHRISTIAN PRINCIPLES AND CONDUCT

The shame, as I see it, is that Danny, Alisse, and John are all senior members of a church whose principles are grounded in Christ.

Yet I believe their conduct contradicts the Christian principles they profess when they allow the harm I report to continue without meaningful intervention.

They speak of, or belong to, a community that professes love, justice, compassion, and divine ethics informed by the teachings of Jesus.

But I have not been allowed to attend their church.

I have repeatedly experienced exclusion from a community whose stated principles I understand to include welcoming people, caring for the vulnerable, and acting with justice and compassion.

I find that contradiction profoundly distressing.

I am particularly concerned about occasions when, according to my account, support workers have been paid to provide care for me but have instead attended church without actually being with me or providing the support I expected.

I want the relevant rosters, timesheets, service records, and communications examined to establish what support was scheduled, what support was delivered, and whether any discrepancies occurred.

I also want an explanation of why I have not been permitted to attend the church in which these people apparently honour love, justice, and divine ethics as principles taught by Jesus.

You cannot profess to honour God's word with one hand while, with the other, allowing a vulnerable person in your care to suffer without addressing their requests for help.

That is the moral contradiction I am challenging.

I ask Danny, Alisse, John, and anyone else involved to examine their own conduct against the Christian principles they profess.

If those principles genuinely mean something, they should be reflected in how vulnerable people are treated, how workers respond to requests for assistance, and whether people experiencing hardship are welcomed rather than excluded.

My request is not that anyone simply agree with every allegation I make. My request is that the evidence be examined, that my concerns receive a substantive response, and that the actions of those responsible be measured against their actual duties and professed principles.

PROVE ME WRONG WITH EVIDENCE, TRANSPARENCY, AND A FAIR EXAMINATION OF THE FACTS—NOT SILENCE, EXCLUSION, OR REFUSAL TO ENGAGE.

MY CONCERNS ABOUT THE COMPANY AND ITS RESPONSIBILITIES

Rachael has nothing to do with disability.

She is an engineer.

The person who does the rosters is not even in the country; she's in India.

Why do you accept this entrapment?

If you had your wits about you, you would speak out and join me, and we could dismantle the corruption.

I WILL WIN, WITH OR WITHOUT YOUR HELP

If you choose to help, you may still have an opportunity to preserve your reputation by acting transparently, speaking up, cooperating with a fair examination of the evidence, and doing what is right.

If you choose not to help, and continue to ignore the evidence or participate in conduct that causes harm, then you should seriously consider the consequences for your professional reputation and employment. I give you this warning: I believe the positions you are relying on may already be at risk, and you should not assume that your jobs are secure if the evidence establishes serious failures or misconduct.

I do not need your cooperation to preserve my evidence or continue pursuing justice. Your participation could, however, make a difference to how these matters are examined and whether you have an opportunity to demonstrate that you acted responsibly.

You have a choice: help establish the truth, or refuse to engage and accept the consequences that may follow from an independent examination of the evidence.

I will continue pursuing vindication, compensation, justice, and accountability regardless. I am giving you the opportunity to do the right thing while that opportunity remains.

That means vindication, compensation, justice, and forceful accountability in all ways: legal, monetary, and spiritually.

WOULD YOU ACCEPT THIS IN YOUR OWN LIFE? — COERCIVE CONTROL, DEATH THREATS, SURVEILLANCE, AND THE DESTRUCTION OF PERSONAL DIGNITY

Would you accept coercive financial control, death threats, alleged police complicity, administrative annihilation, the weaponisation of psychiatric processes, political exile, the circumstances of seeking asylum, or electronic surveillance if you were the person experiencing them?

Would you accept having your credibility attacked, your requests for help disregarded, your personal circumstances undermined, and your ability to live with dignity diminished while those responsible for your support continued with their ordinary lives?

These are among the grave circumstances I describe in my personal testimony. I allege that I have experienced a sustained pattern of intimidation, exclusion, financial control, institutional failure, and targeting. I ask you not to dismiss these concerns through assumptions about my character or circumstances, but to examine the records and material I have published.

I have published recordings that I interpret as documenting manipulation of my television's Wi-Fi connection, accompanied by what I describe as abusive and accusation-laden slurs. I have also described recordings that I believe capture a pattern of electronic surveillance, harassment, and targeted verbal abuse. The source, context, and meaning of these recordings should be examined carefully rather than assumed.

The words I report hearing include:

"faggot, you raped her, fucking pedo, kill yourself, they all know, they won't help you"

I regard these words as degrading, threatening, and deeply distressing. They invoke homophobic abuse, serious sexual accusations, encouragement of self-harm, social intimidation, and the suggestion that others have already judged me or will refuse to assist me.

I believe these recordings are important evidence of what I have experienced. However, the identity of any speaker, the origin of the audio, and whether the recordings establish electronic interference or coordination by particular people or authorities must be determined through appropriate technical and independent examination.

My question to every person involved in my support is straightforward: would you accept this treatment for yourself, and would you consider it acceptable if it were happening to someone you were paid to support?

I ask you to take these concerns seriously, preserve relevant records, examine the material in context, and respond to the substance of my account. Do not substitute rumour, stigma, or assumptions for evidence. If you dispute my interpretation, identify the specific issue and the evidence on which your position rests.

I am asking for a fair examination, protection of my dignity and safety, and meaningful accountability wherever the evidence establishes that wrongdoing or a failure of responsibility has occurred.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENT — WITNESS TESTIMONY, ALLEGED SURVEILLANCE, ELECTRONIC HARASSMENT, AND THE PRESERVATION OF EVIDENCE

Kim was present during incidents that I consider significant to my account. I state that Kim acknowledged surveillance and also acknowledged unusual audio harassment occurring inside the house. Kim was also present when, according to my recollection, an individual whom I regarded as suspicious approached us directly at the park and then concealed himself in the bushes. I consider these incidents important and ask that Kim's own recollection and any relevant communications be examined.

I have also described my drug use and my belief that aspects of my sexuality and private life have subsequently been weaponised against me, distorted into accusations of criminality, or used to intimidate and discredit me. I am concerned about interactions on dating or social applications involving people I perceived to be very young, including people whose ages I could not reliably establish. I believe some interactions may have been deliberately provocative or deceptive. These concerns require careful examination of the actual communications, the ages involved, the surrounding context, and any available evidence. I do not suggest that age or intent should be assumed without verification.

I have recorded incidents and preserved material that I believe documents harassment, abusive language, provocative interactions, and conduct that I experienced as deliberate targeting. My position is that I have not simply experienced these events and forgotten them: I have made efforts to document what occurred, retain the records, and establish a chronology that can be examined.

I want the distinction made clear between what I personally witnessed, what Kim or other people may have acknowledged, what the recordings actually capture, and the conclusions I have drawn from those experiences. The original recordings, complete communications, dates, metadata where available, and independent technical assessments should be considered together. That is how the authenticity, context, source, and significance of the material can be properly evaluated.

I do not accept that my awareness of the conduct I report, or my decision to document it, should itself be used to dismiss my testimony. If I have recorded relevant incidents, those records should be examined on their merits. If an interpretation is disputed, the underlying evidence should be assessed fairly rather than rejected merely because my account is contested.

My central point is that I have sought to document what I believe has happened to me. I want the evidence preserved, the people with direct knowledge given an opportunity to provide their accounts, and the material assessed independently.

I also recognise that recording an incident does not, by itself, establish who caused it, whether separate events were coordinated, or whether a particular authority or individual was responsible. Those questions must be resolved through evidence, not assumption.

I ask Able Point and the relevant independent authorities to take these concerns seriously, preserve any records within their possession that may be relevant, and ensure that my care and safety are addressed without prejudice, retaliation, or reliance on unverified allegations about my private life.

ADDITIONAL PERSONAL TESTIMONY — KIM, THE SURVEILLANCE, THE AUDIO HARASSMENT, AND THE RECORDING OF TARGETING

Kim admitted the Surveillance. She also admitted to the weird audio harassment inside the house. She was there when a weird agent bee-lined us at the park and hid in the bushes.

You all know I use drugs as a means to electro my sexuality, which is then weaponised against me and twisted into criminality, baited by very young or underage men on the apps by local people.

I am aware I'm targeted like this, and I have recorded all of their deliberately deceitful attacks, unaware that their deliberate targeting and harassment was being recorded as evidence by me.

You cannot surveil a victim who is aware of his perpetrators and who is surveilling them back. The entire concept of surveillance is null and void.

SIGNIFICANCE — THE HUMAN COST, DUTY OF CARE, CHARACTER ASSASSINATION, AND MORAL RESPONSIBILITY

No NDIS provider, and no rational human being, should accept the entrapment, abuse, neglect, poverty, surveillance, alleged gang-stalking and deliberate targeting, financial destruction, administrative annihilation, death threats, alleged police complicity, or the corruption of legal and media processes that I describe in my account.

I allege that I have been subjected to a sustained pattern of targeting, intimidation, financial devastation, exclusion, and institutional failure. I further fear that people and institutions with the power to protect me have instead contributed to, ignored, or failed to investigate the conditions in which I have been left to live.

I am particularly concerned that the circumstances surrounding my care have involved alleged surveillance, harassment, and neglect, alongside the creation or continuation of conditions that could place a vulnerable person at serious risk of psychological and physical harm, including suicide. I am not suicidal. My concern is that the conditions I describe are dangerous, and that people responsible for providing support must not participate in, ignore, or allow those conditions to continue without appropriate intervention.

There is another significant dimension to this situation: what I believe has been a deliberate campaign of slander, character assassination, and reputational destruction, operating like a black-market budget against my life, testimony, credibility, and influence. I believe that damaging narratives about me have been used to undermine my standing, discredit my account, isolate me from others, and make it easier for people to disregard the harm I report.

My account is based on evidence that I have fact-checked, examined, documented, and published in the public domain. I have preserved records, source material, documents, and testimony that I consider relevant to understanding my circumstances. This published material is the foundation on which I ask others to assess my account. It is what I rely on when explaining my experience and the conclusions I have drawn from the records available to me.

I ask you to examine that evidence directly rather than relying on rumours, insinuations, private whispers, or unsubstantiated claims about my character. Where a statement can be checked against a document, communication, date, recording, or other source, I want it checked. Where an interpretation is disputed, I want the underlying evidence examined. Where a claim cannot be substantiated, it should not be repeated as though it were an established fact.

There is something fundamentally wrong with accepting allegations about a person without first establishing what the evidence actually shows. I have never been arrested. I have never been charged. I am not aware of any court proceeding or judicial finding establishing criminal wrongdoing on my part. I ask you to consider those facts before accepting rumours, insinuations, or allegations about my character as though they were proven findings.

Why, then, would any of you automatically believe the slander and lies that I believe powerful and wealthy people have used to discredit me, while disregarding my own testimony and the evidence I have preserved? Why would you choose the comfort of a convenient story over the responsibility of investigating what is actually happening?

If you are acting on the basis of these whispers, allegations, or claims about me, I want to see your evidence. Where is it? What exactly are you relying on? Who made the allegation? When was it made? What primary source supports it? Has it been independently verified?

I am asking for evidence, not insinuation; documented facts, not gossip; and a fair examination, not a verdict reached through social pressure.

If you have been told something about me that has influenced how you treat me, then I believe I am entitled to ask what that information is and what reliable evidence supports it, particularly where it affects the care, assistance, respect, or professional treatment I receive. If you are making decisions about my support based on allegations, I ask you to identify the relevant information and explain how those decisions are justified.

I want to see the evidence of these accusations. I want to know where it is, what it establishes, and whether it has been independently checked. If the evidence exists, produce it for fair examination. If it does not exist, then I ask you to stop treating rumour as fact.

ADDITIONAL SIGNIFICANCE — FRAUD OR CRIME IN PLAIN SIGHT, COMPLICITY, AND THE RESPONSIBILITY TO SPEAK

My position is that when evidence of alleged fraud or crime is brought into plain sight and explained to the people who may have knowledge of it, the matter cannot responsibly be dismissed without examination. I believe that any party who has been presented with credible information about potential wrongdoing has a responsibility to consider it seriously, preserve relevant evidence, and use appropriate channels to report or refer the matter where warranted.

In my view, refusing to acknowledge or address credible evidence does not resolve the underlying concern. It can allow the circumstances being reported to continue without scrutiny or intervention. I therefore challenge anyone who has been made aware of the matters described in this statement to explain what they know, what they have examined, what action they have taken, and why they believe their response is appropriate.

I regard continued defence of people whom I believe may be responsible for serious wrongdoing, after the concerns and supporting material have been explained to them, as a matter of significant moral and professional concern. I have used the expression "master criminals" to describe my view of those I believe may be directing or benefiting from the conduct I allege. That expression represents my allegation and characterisation; it is not, by itself, an established legal finding. The identity of any responsible person, the existence of any offence, and the degree of any individual's involvement must be determined through evidence and appropriate independent processes.

I also distinguish between deliberate participation, knowingly assisting wrongdoing, negligent failure to respond, disagreement about the evidence, and a person who has not been adequately informed. These are not automatically the same thing. Silence or inaction alone does not establish criminal guilt or prove that someone consents to a crime. However, where a person has relevant knowledge or a professional duty to respond, their decisions and omissions may warrant examination in context.

My central concern is that no person should knowingly help conceal wrongdoing, obstruct a fair investigation, destroy or withhold relevant records, or use their position to prevent legitimate concerns from being examined. Equally, no person should be condemned solely because of association, silence, or an allegation that has not been tested. The proper response is to preserve the evidence, identify what each person actually knew, examine the actions taken or omitted, and establish responsibility fairly.

I ask every person who has received my testimony or reviewed the material I have provided to stop and consider whether they are responding to the evidence itself or defending an established position, an employer, a colleague, or a powerful person because doing otherwise may be uncomfortable. If the evidence supports my concerns, I ask that the concerns be addressed through appropriate independent channels. If the evidence contradicts my account, I ask that the specific contradictions and supporting sources be identified so that they can be examined.

For me, the significance is this: credible evidence of alleged wrongdoing deserves examination, not automatic dismissal; relevant records should be preserved; and people should not knowingly obstruct accountability. I will continue to seek a fair examination of the evidence and to distinguish my testimony and conclusions from matters that have been independently established. My purpose is to pursue truth, protection, accountability, justice, and appropriate redress—not to substitute accusation for proof.

MY PROFESSIONAL, ETHICAL, CREATIVE, AND PERSONAL BACKGROUND

I am a former journalist, a PhD in ethics, AI, and posthumanism framed by the Anthropocene, and a religious person of strong faith. I am an advocate, an artist, and an author with more than 30 years of experience. I have also previously run my own business as an NDIS provider.

I understand that caring for a vulnerable person is not merely a matter of filling a roster, recording hours, collecting payment, or meeting the minimum appearance of compliance. It is a responsibility that demands integrity, compassion, sound judgement, accountability, and a genuine commitment to the person's welfare.

Having run my own NDIS provider business, I know how seriously I regard the responsibility of caring for another human being. I would never, ever, under any circumstances I could fathom, knowingly allow a client in my own business to be dumped in the conditions in which I believe you have left me.

I would not accept a situation in which a client was left without the support they needed, deprived of dignity, isolated from meaningful assistance, or expected to endure unresolved concerns while the people responsible carried on as though nothing were wrong. I would not consider it acceptable to leave a vulnerable person struggling in circumstances that I would never willingly accept for myself.

My professional experience, ethical commitments, advocacy, creative work, and faith all inform the standard against which I judge these circumstances. They are also why I cannot simply accept silence, exclusion, or an apparent refusal to investigate as an adequate response to the concerns I have raised.

I am asking you to consider the difference between providing a service on paper and actually caring for the person who depends on it. If the records say that support was provided, I want the evidence to establish what happened in practice. If the scheduled support was not delivered, I want that discrepancy addressed. If concerns were raised, I want to know what was done in response.

I ask you to consider whether you would regard your own conduct as acceptable if the person affected were someone you loved, someone you were responsible for, or someone whose welfare depended entirely on your decisions.

Your integrity is not demonstrated by repeating what the crowd believes. Your honesty is not demonstrated by remaining silent because speaking up may be uncomfortable. Your moral and ethical obligations are not discharged by accepting a convenient narrative about the vulnerable person you are paid to support.

None of you would willingly accept such circumstances in your own lives. None of you would want your credibility destroyed by untested allegations, your testimony dismissed because of gossip, your financial security undermined, or your requests for help ignored because others had already decided what kind of person you were.

Why, then, should these circumstances be considered acceptable when the person enduring them is someone in your care—and when you are financially remunerated to provide that care?

You have a responsibility to examine what is happening, respond to legitimate requests for assistance, preserve relevant evidence, and raise concerns through appropriate reporting and oversight channels. That includes researching the circumstances rather than relying on hearsay, examining the records rather than accepting assumptions, and ensuring that any decisions affecting my care are based on relevant evidence rather than personal prejudice or the influence of others.

I also call for any evidence of misconduct, improper influence, failures by police or other authorities, or compromised legal and media processes to be examined independently. My allegations about these matters require evidence-based scrutiny; they should neither be accepted uncritically nor dismissed without examination.

If you believe my account is wrong, the answer is an impartial examination of the evidence, not silence, exclusion, character assassination, or the continuation of unmet support needs.

The choice to follow the crowd may feel comfortable. It may protect you from immediate disagreement or professional discomfort. But comfort is not proof, popularity is not truth, and the repetition of an allegation does not make it a fact.

Choosing the crowd over the person you are paid to support raises serious questions about professional integrity, honesty, compassion, and accountability. If you have accepted damaging claims about me without investigating them, I ask you to reconsider whether that decision is consistent with your own moral and ethical standards.

The fundamental questions remain:

Would you accept this treatment in your own life?

Would you accept having your testimony discredited, your character attacked, and your requests for assistance disregarded because others had chosen to believe a convenient story about you?

If not, on what moral or professional basis do you accept it for a vulnerable person whose care you are paid to provide?

And if you are relying on allegations against me, where is your evidence? Show me what you are relying on. Let it be examined fairly, in context, and against the available records.

Your answer should be demonstrated through your actions, your records, your willingness to speak honestly, your readiness to investigate before judging, and your response to the evidence—not merely through what you say about your values.

I am not asking you to accept every allegation I make without question. I am asking you to apply the same standard of fairness to me that you would demand for yourselves: investigate before judging, distinguish allegations from findings, protect the vulnerable, and refuse to sacrifice your integrity simply because standing apart from the crowd is difficult.

My position is straightforward: examine the evidence I have published, identify any specific errors with supporting sources, disclose the evidence behind any allegations being made about me, and allow the facts to be tested fairly. Do not condemn a person on the strength of whispers while refusing to examine the documentary record.

Someone threatened to murder me, and he was arrested before Wong Court. I regard Able Point's alleged refusal to make a mandated report as an extraordinary failure of accountability and justice. If none of you has already stood up and acted on this, your silence raises serious questions about where you stand in this fight and whether you are willing to stand for my safety, accountability, and justice.

So if you decide to accept your shit jobs and their blood money to harm me, even as Able Point is using you all as moronic pawns and then trapping you to the wage because you need to pay your rent, and look the other way while you are well aware you're harming me, I won't be held responsible for the divine justice and reckoning God is just about to release on my behalf.

I don't need revenge.

I don’t hate you.

I have no ill intentions for any of you.

I handed the balance back to God, and revenge and divine justice are His and His alone.

I’m the nice person waiting for you all, even though I know you all have already financially benefited from allowing my harm.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENT — STAFF COMMUNICATIONS, HISTORICAL GROUP CHATS, AND OFFERS OF HELP

I want to make the circumstances surrounding my access to Able Point staff communications absolutely clear.

I have communicated personally with staff members and have offered them help, grace, mercy, and an opportunity to speak honestly about their experiences and the circumstances surrounding their employment and the matters I have raised. My approach has not been motivated by a desire for revenge. I have sought to give people an opportunity to do what I believe is right, to speak openly, and to help establish the truth.

In my experience, many of those to whom I have extended that grace and offered that mercy have rejected it, turned it away, or responded in ways that I have experienced as a rejection of the help I was genuinely trying to offer. I believe that the moral and spiritual significance of those choices should not be dismissed. In my faith, I understand God to be deeply concerned with truth, justice, mercy, the treatment of vulnerable people, and the refusal to turn away from wrongdoing. I believe that rejecting opportunities to act with compassion and integrity carries serious moral and spiritual consequences. When I say that God is furious, I am expressing my religious conviction about the seriousness of what I believe has occurred and the injustice I believe remains unaddressed.

I also want to be explicit about the source of my knowledge of the staff group chats. Before certain disgruntled employees were dismissed or otherwise left the company, they provided me with complete copy-and-paste copies of the staff group chats to which I am referring. These were communications supplied to me by staff members themselves. My access to those historical conversations therefore arises from communications that employees personally provided to me, rather than merely from my speculation that such conversations existed.

I have historically retained access to those copies and refer to them because I believe they contain material relevant to the circumstances, discussions, decisions, relationships, and conduct described in my statement. They are part of the documentary material I consider important to an examination of what happened, what was communicated among staff, what concerns were raised, and how the people involved responded.

I have also spoken personally with former Able Point employees who have been willing to discuss their experiences. Some told me that they wanted to speak out about matters they considered a threat to the Agency and were subsequently dismissed or otherwise left their employment. One former employee, according to my understanding, had a sexual relationship with Rachael and was subsequently fired. Another was let go with the explanation that they apparently did not fit what the company was looking for at that time. These are matters I report from my own communications and understanding; the underlying circumstances should be established by examining the relevant evidence.

My position is that I have made genuine efforts to communicate with staff, offer assistance, and provide opportunities for people to act with honesty and compassion. I have preserved material that I consider relevant, including the historical group-chat copies provided to me by employees. I know what I have personally seen, what people have communicated to me, and what I have documented. I ask that these sources be examined in their proper context.

Those who have received my offers of help now have a choice about how they respond to the concerns I have raised. They can examine the available evidence, preserve relevant records, speak truthfully about what they know, and cooperate with an impartial examination. Alternatively, they may decline to engage. I cannot make that decision for them.

I am not asking anyone to accept every allegation simply because I have made it. I am asking that the evidence be examined fairly, that the historical communications not be dismissed without scrutiny, and that the distinction between documented material, personal testimony, interpretation, and independently established findings be maintained.

The central point is this: I personally communicated with staff and offered help; staff members provided me with copies of historical group chats before they were dismissed or left the company; and I have preserved material that I believe is relevant to the matters I have raised. I ask that these circumstances be taken seriously and assessed through a transparent, evidence-based process rather than through rumour, silence, or assumptions about my motives.

CLOSING STATEMENT — TESTIMONY, TRUTH, ACCOUNTABILITY, AND FAITH

I am the future your lies cannot live in.

I am the truth you cannot silence, the testimony you cannot erase, and the record you cannot undo.

You may reject my words, deny my experience, or attempt to discredit my name, but the evidence remains to be examined, the questions remain to be answered, and accountability remains to be pursued.

I will continue to preserve my testimony, document what I have experienced, and seek truth, justice, and vindication. I leave the ultimate judgment to God.

PRESERVATION NOTE

This is an organised version of my personal statement, incorporating the additional details concerning Danny, Zac, WorkCover, the alleged failure to intervene, the possible consequences for Danny's family, Rachael and Brett's responses, the church-related concerns, the alleged surveillance and electronic harassment, Kim's reported admissions, my recordings, and the historical staff group chats and offers of help.

The statements concerning individuals, the company, the alleged assault, liability, intimidation, surveillance, and other conduct represent my account, allegations, beliefs, and interpretations. The underlying records should be examined independently, and the precise legal significance of any WorkCover decision should be determined from the actual decision and supporting documents.

For my records, I will retain the original messages in their original form as well as this combined version. Supporting evidence, dates, communications, WorkCover documents, rosters, service records, historical group chats, recordings, and other source documents should be preserved separately so that my account and the underlying evidence remain distinguishable.

FINAL DECLARATION — LET THE RECORD SPEAK, LET EVERYONE ANSWER FOR THEMSELVES, AND LET THE LIES BE BURIED TOGETHER

The strongest ending is one that leaves those who dismissed me facing the record, their decisions, and the questions they cannot answer—not one that relies on insults. It is sharper, more uncompromising, and more confronting through the contrast between what people claimed and what the evidence may establish.

To those who dismissed me, underestimated me, turned away from my testimony, or believed that I would eventually disappear into silence: the record is here.

You had the opportunity to listen. You had the opportunity to ask questions. You had the opportunity to examine the evidence, challenge what you disputed, correct what was wrong, and do what was right.

What you chose to do is now part of the history that must be examined.

I do not need to destroy your reputations. I do not need to manufacture accusations or beg anyone to believe me. I need only insist that the evidence be examined, the contradictions addressed, the records preserved, and the decisions explained.

If your actions were proper, let the evidence demonstrate it. If your decisions were justified, let your reasons withstand scrutiny. If my account is wrong, identify precisely where and show the evidence. But if mistakes were made, if responsibilities were neglected, or if credible concerns were knowingly ignored, then have the courage to acknowledge what happened and accept whatever accountability is fairly established.

The humiliation of being confronted by the truth is not something I need to inflict. It is the consequence people risk when their own documented decisions are placed beside their stated principles.

You may have mistaken my suffering for weakness, my isolation for defeat, or my persistence for something you could eventually wear down. You may have assumed that, without influence or support, my testimony would never matter.

Yet here stands the record you must now answer on its merits.

I remain the person who spoke, who documented, who questioned, and who refused to let unanswered questions be mistaken for resolved matters. I will continue to seek truth, lawful accountability, and appropriate redress.

I will not ask for revenge. I will ask for examination. I will not demand that anyone accept my conclusions without proof. I will demand that the evidence receive the scrutiny it deserves.

Let every claim be tested. Let every contradiction be exposed. Let every decision be accounted for. Let the truth—not status, intimidation, reputation, or power—determine the outcome.

THE DAY HAS ALREADY HAPPENED

And to those who believed I would never have the final word: that day has already happened.

The record exists. The testimony has been spoken. The evidence has been preserved. The questions have been placed before those who must confront them. What was once dismissed, ignored, or assumed to disappear has become a record that can be examined beyond the reach of denial.

The day you thought would never come is already here.

I am no longer waiting for permission to speak, for recognition to exist, or for someone else to decide whether my testimony deserves to be heard. I have spoken. I have documented. I have preserved what I can. The record now stands, and its contents must be judged on their merits.

You may still dispute my interpretation. You may still challenge my conclusions. You may still offer explanations for your decisions. But the opportunity to pretend that no questions were raised, no concerns were communicated, and no testimony was given is no longer yours to exercise without scrutiny.

I will not bury the truth to protect reputations, and I will not allow the truth to be buried beneath silence, denial, or indifference. Every contradiction must face scrutiny. Every decision must stand against the evidence. Every claim must withstand examination.

I do not need to predict the future to declare this: the reckoning with the record has begun because the record is already here. What remains is for the relevant evidence to be examined, the unanswered questions to be addressed, and any responsibility established by a fair process to be acknowledged.

I sought to be heard. I created the record. I brought the questions into the open.

The day of testimony is past. The day of examination is here. And the day of accountability must be determined by what the evidence establishes.

LET THE LIES, CONTRADICTIONS, AND FALSEHOODS BE BURIED TOGETHER

I will not bury the truth. I will not allow the record to be buried. And I will not confuse revenge with justice.

Let the lies, contradictions, and falsehoods—where the evidence establishes them—be buried together beneath the weight of the truth. Let the record outlast denial. Let the evidence speak louder than power. Let accountability follow wherever the facts lead.

I do not need to destroy anyone. I do not need to threaten anyone. I do not need to manufacture a victory through words alone. The proper examination of the record is what matters. Those who believe their actions can withstand scrutiny have the opportunity to demonstrate that. Those who dispute my testimony have the opportunity to identify the evidence and explain their position.

But no one can make this record disappear simply because its existence is uncomfortable.

No one can undo the fact that concerns were raised, testimony was recorded, and questions were put forward for examination. No one can turn an unanswered question into an answered one merely by refusing to respond.

If the evidence establishes wrongdoing, let responsibility be determined fairly. If the evidence establishes that an allegation is mistaken, let that too be acknowledged. Let neither power nor prejudice decide what only evidence and fair examination can establish.

I will continue to stand by my right to speak, to preserve my testimony, to seek answers, and to pursue lawful accountability and appropriate redress. I will continue to insist that my words be considered on their merits rather than dismissed because of who I am, what I have endured, or how inconvenient my questions may be.

I do not need the final word. I need the record to remain, the evidence to be heard, and the truth to have its day.

And to those who believed that day would never come:

THAT DAY HAS ALREADY HAPPENED.

The record remains. The testimony remains. The questions remain. The opportunity for honest examination remains.

Let the evidence stand. Let the truth be tested. Let responsibility be established fairly. Let the record outlast every attempt to dismiss it.

I will not bury the truth to save appearances. I will not surrender the record to silence. And I will not allow the pursuit of justice to be mistaken for revenge.

The day has already happened. The record is here. The examination must follow wherever the evidence leads.

LET THE RECORD SPEAK. LET THE TRUTH ENDURE. LET THE LIES BE BURIED TOGETHER. AND LET ACCOUNTABILITY HAVE ITS DAY.

A FINAL WARNING — DO NOT MISTAKE GRACE FOR WEAKNESS

Ignore me at your peril.

I warn you: do not spit in the face of the grave I offered grace that God placed in me. Do not mistake my willingness to offer mercy for an inability to recognise wrongdoing, and do not mistake my restraint for surrender. The grace I extended was not an admission of weakness. It was an opportunity to do what was right while that opportunity remained open.

I offered the chance to listen, to reconsider, to acknowledge the concerns raised, to examine the evidence, and to choose a better course. I offered that grace because I believed there was still room for conscience, repentance, and truth.

Do not confuse the grace I have shown with a guarantee that consequences will never follow.

I am not God, and I do not claim to speak for His judgment. But I believe that the grace God placed within me should never have been mistaken for permission to disregard my testimony, dismiss my concerns, or treat my willingness to forgive as though it made accountability unnecessary.

God is not as kind as me.

Those are my words, my warning, and my expression of the gravity with which I regard the grace I extended. I leave divine judgment to God. I will not pretend to determine it myself. But I will not apologise for offering grace, and I will not allow that grace to be used to silence me or erase the need for truth.

You were given an opportunity to respond with honesty. You were given an opportunity to examine what I placed before you. You were given an opportunity to act with conscience rather than convenience.

What you do with that opportunity is your responsibility.

Ignore the testimony if you choose—but do not assume that ignoring it makes the record disappear. Reject my conclusions if you believe they are wrong—but answer the evidence with evidence. Refuse reconciliation if you will—but do not mistake the grace I offered for the surrender of my right to seek justice.

My grace was an opportunity, not an acquittal. My restraint was a choice, not an admission. My faith is not a licence for anyone to treat me unjustly.

Ignore me at your peril. The record remains, the questions remain, and the opportunity to do what is right must not be confused with an entitlement to escape accountability.

"If you find this document and do not know what it is for, believe it is in error, or consider it irrelevant to you, delete it. But it will stick in the filthy, dark craw of your bitter throat that refuses to speak to me in response.

STAMP & VERIFY

PRIVATE RECORD — ORIGINAL STATEMENT REGARDING ABLE POINT AND NDIS SUPPORT WORKERS.pdf 163.1 kB
SHA256:
8f211362984775 87d2c1f30d8672484ecc6a4c188324585015c370a1f6b93723

SUCCESS!

OpenTimestamps receipt created and download started