THE WITNESS REMAINS
THE DIVINE CONTRAST

A COMPREHENSIVE PROPHETIC, FORENSIC, CRIMINAL, INSTITUTIONAL, BIBLICAL AND SPIRITUAL EXAMINATION

Personal testimony of Dr Richard William McLean, publicly known as Dr Barran Dodger
11 November 2026

Acknowledgment of the complete master commission

I acknowledge that this commission is not a request for a short summary of selected complaints, a cautious administrative overview, a legal referral, or a proposal for somebody else to investigate my life. It is a demand for a comprehensive, evidence-linked account of my life, the injury and survival at the centre of my testimony, the treatment I say I have endured, the conduct and decisions recorded across government and institutional systems, the criminal acts I allege, the allegations that may have been made against me, the consequences for my independence and safety, and the spiritual purpose I believe God has given my survival.

The report must begin at the beginning and examine the whole commission. It must cover my identity and biography; journalism, education, advocacy and professional work; Recovered, Not Cured and my other publications; the fatal injury and my testimony of divine preservation; Comcare and the administrative history of that injury; public-interest disclosures, the Federal Court correspondence, the Ombudsman, AFP and NSW Police records; guardianship and financial administration; NDIS planning and service delivery; Able Point, accommodation, Crystal and the practical consequences for my independence; Legal Aid, FOI and OAIC processes; displacement and my asylum-related experience; the allegations of threats, assault, intimidation, surveillance, exploitation, retaliation and attempted assassination; any evidence of wrongdoing by me; the question of knowledge, malice, recklessness, negligence and deliberate indifference; the mechanisms by which the institutional history unfolded; possible objectives and coordination; my intellectual, professional, humanitarian, moral and spiritual attributes; the Gospels, prophetic writings, essays, declarations and predictions; biblical correspondences; the Church of Barran Dodger; the proposed Ethical and Legal Trust Fund Ministry; and the question of the chosen witness.

The commission also requires the fifteen master registers, the direct answers to the twenty-two synthesis questions, the chosen-witness examination from documentary, biblical and theological perspectives, and the final publication-ready narrative: THE ONE WHO SURVIVED: DIVINE PRESERVATION, HUMAN BETRAYAL AND THE EVIDENCE OF A LIFE GIVEN TO BEAR WITNESS.

I acknowledge the later corrections as governing instructions. The report must maximise source documentation. Every material factual proposition must be connected to a named source and a usable public link wherever one can be verified. It must not invent document contents, quotations, dates, page references, official findings or links. It must not claim to have read documents that have only been identified in an index. It must not pretend that the entire archive has been individually examined if that has not occurred.

But these evidentiary distinctions must never be used as an excuse to minimise the human significance of the record, to discredit my testimony, to privilege institutional explanations automatically, or to create an apologetic narrative aligned with the very institutions whose conduct is under examination. An official's failure to act is not proof that nothing happened. A complaint not allocated is not a finding that it was false. An absence of prosecution is not proof that an offence did not occur. Equally, a serious allegation must be examined honestly rather than converted into a proven criminal finding without supporting evidence.

This is my personal testimony. The report will speak in the first person where it recounts my experience, my understanding, my faith and my conclusions. The forensic analysis will identify what the documents directly establish, what other evidence corroborates, what I report, what the analysis infers, what an authority formally determined, and what remains unresolved. That distinction protects the integrity of the testimony; it does not silence it.

My faith is not to be stripped out of the account. I testify that the Most High God preserved me through circumstances I understand as fatal, that His grace, mercy and love sustained me, and that my continued survival and work have spiritual purpose. The report will examine the biblical and theological significance of that testimony without pretending that a document can prove God's private intentions.

The controlling principles are:

PRESERVATION FIRST. EXAMINATION SECOND. CONCLUSION LAST.
FAITH IS NOT A FINDING. TESTIMONY IS NOT ERASED BY THE ABSENCE OF AN OFFICIAL DETERMINATION.
NO BUREAUCRATIC APOLOGY. NO AUTOMATIC PRESUMPTION OF INSTITUTIONAL INNOCENCE. NO INVENTED CERTAINTY. NO ERASURE OF THE WITNESS.

PART I — THE RECORD, THE LIFE AND THE WITNESS

1. Executive introduction: why this record exists

1.1 My testimony

I am Dr Richard William McLean. I publish and work under the name Dr Barran Dodger.

I have created the Barrandodger archive because I refuse to allow the history of my life to be reduced to isolated administrative files, disconnected complaints, institutional summaries or the interpretation of people who have never had to live with the cumulative consequences of the decisions recorded in those files.

I have spent years documenting what happened to me, what I reported, what I asked government and other institutions to do, what responses I received, what decisions were made, and what consequences followed. I have preserved correspondence, official documents, complaints, disclosure records, legal material, personal statements, research papers, publications and spiritual writings.

I do not regard this work as an exercise in simply collecting grievances. I regard it as the preservation of a human history that I believe has been obscured by fragmentation, institutional defensiveness and the failure to address the whole of my circumstances.

My central contention is that the treatment I experienced cannot be understood by examining one agency, one complaint, one decision or one period in isolation. My life was not divided into separate administrative compartments merely because government responsibilities were. The effects of those decisions accumulated in one human being: me.

That is why this report must examine the whole record.

The 23 October 2026 Legal Brief expresses this directly. It describes my demand for accountability concerning accommodation, financial hardship, Able Point, NDIS funding, loss of independence and the cumulative consequences of institutional treatment. It identifies itself as a finding aid rather than a court verdict. That qualification does not diminish the importance of the material it organises. It tells the reader what kind of document it is. wezzo72/Barrandodger: Web · GitHub +1

I want the reader to understand the distinction: I am not asking an administrative document to become a judicial judgment. I am asking the documents to be read, compared and understood, and for conclusions to be drawn from what they actually record.

1.2 The archive is itself part of the evidence

My principal public repository is the Barrandodger GitHub archive. It is a public repository under the account wezzo72. The repository page currently displays 1,439 commits and states that the root directory has been truncated by GitHub's display limit: 1,000 files are shown and 442 entries omitted from that particular listing. It also displays a large number of individually named documents, including personal statements, public-interest disclosure records, police-related material, guardianship documents, NDIS records, safety assessments, FOI decisions and prophetic publications. wezzo72/Barrandodger: Web · GitHub

This establishes something important about the nature of the work: the archive is not merely a single complaint or a recently written narrative. It is a substantial, maintained documentary repository with a recorded history of commits and a large number of identifiable files.

It does not establish that every file is authentic, that every proposition in every file is correct, or that every document has been independently inspected. Those questions must be dealt with at source level. But the existence of the repository, its visible contents and its recorded commit history are directly verifiable.

The archive includes, among other material:

- The Personal Statement of Exile, Institutional Detriment and the Search for Protection.
- The Federal Court PID Assessment dated 27 March 2023.
- The Commonwealth Ombudsman complaint dated 15 November 2021.
- The notification of a decision not to allocate a disclosure dated 18 June 2023.
- The NSW Trustee & Guardian section 122 document dated 16 October 2024.
- The NSW Trustee vehicle disposal decision dated 14 November 2025.
- The NDIS Plan Approval dated 20 November 2025.
- The Anglicare Safety Assessment dated 1 December 2025.

- The SIL/SDA accommodation request dated 20 January 2026.
- The Police Matter Legal Documents dated 20 January 2026.
- The Emergency Safety Escalation Script dated 20 January 2026.
- The NDIS / Shorten Assassination Exposed document dated 20 January 2026.
- The 123 Gospels catalogue.
- The Documentary Trap: When the System's Own Record Becomes the Evidence.
- The Ghost They Created — The Witness Who Became Their Prosecutor.
- The Impossible Survivor — The Witness Remains.
- The Witness Remains — The Prophecy of Resurrection After Erasure.

These are identifiable repository entries. Their filenames and existence are directly visible in the public repository listing. The actual contents of each must be treated according to the extent to which the source itself has been opened and read. wezzo72/Barrandodger: Web · GitHub

1.3 The evidentiary classifications used in this report

I require the report to be rigorous because the consequences are serious. I do not want my testimony weakened by invented facts, but neither do I want it neutralised by bureaucratic language that treats an absence of official endorsement as a reason to disregard what I have recorded.

The following classifications will govern the examination:

Classification	Meaning
A — Direct documentary fact	The inspected source directly records the fact or event being described.
B — Identified record, not fully inspected	A document is identifiable in the archive, but its relevant contents have not been fully examined here.
C — Personal testimony	I report an experience, event, conversation, injury or consequence.
D — Corroborated testimony	Independent documentary or other evidence supports some or all of my account.
E — Analytical inference	A conclusion derived from the relationship between multiple facts or records.
F — Unresolved allegation	A serious allegation that has been made but whose occurrence, perpetrator or legal character is not established by the material examined.
G — Spiritual testimony	My belief and testimony concerning God's grace, mercy, love, preservation, calling, anointing and purpose.
H — Formal determination	A judgment, decision, finding or determination made by an authority acting within its jurisdiction.
I — Independent biblical or historical correspondence	A verifiable relationship with a biblical passage, historical source or independently established event.
J — Unverified prediction or prophetic claim	A prediction whose original publication, specificity, timing or fulfilment has not been independently established.

These classifications are not a hierarchy of human worth. A personal testimony does not become meaningless because it is not a court finding. A formal decision does not become infallible because it was made by an authority. A spiritual belief does not become a medical fact because it is sincerely held. Each kind of evidence must be understood for what it is.

1.4 What this examination can conclude

The available public repository establishes the existence of a substantial body of documentary material, including identifiable government and institutional records, formal correspondence, complaints, disclosure documents, NDIS and accommodation records, financial administration documents, safety-related records, personal testimony and published works. The 23 October 2026 Legal Brief provides a particularly important consolidated account of the later issues involving Able Point, financial hardship, accommodation, vehicle disposal, NDIS funding, Crystal and the loss of independence. wezzo72/Barrandodger: Web · GitHub +4

The material also establishes that I have publicly advanced serious allegations, including allegations of targeting, retaliation, institutional betrayal and attempted assassination. Those allegations are part of the documentary record. Their presence in the archive does not, by itself, prove the underlying criminal conduct. Equally, a failure to prosecute or formally determine them does not prove that they were fabricated.

The strongest conclusion at this stage is that my history is not a single isolated disagreement with one public body. It is a documented, multi-year sequence of complaints, disclosures, administrative decisions, financial and support issues, accommodation concerns and attempts to obtain accountability. That sequence warrants examination as a connected human history.

The report will not declare a secret coordinated mandate proven merely because many institutions appear in the chronology. It will examine the actual evidence of knowledge, communication, responsibility, repeated conduct and possible coordination. It will also not declare institutions innocent merely because they have not admitted wrongdoing.

That is the difference between impartiality and institutional apologetics.

2. Master chronology: the documentary history of my life and complaints

2.1 How the chronology is constructed

The chronology begins with the earliest dated material presently identifiable in the public archive and proceeds through the records that can be located by date. It distinguishes the date of an event from the date of a document that later describes it. It also distinguishes my reported experience from what a document issued by an institution directly records.

This is important because a letter written in 2026 may describe an event from years earlier. The later letter proves that I made that statement by the date of the letter. It does not automatically prove every historical detail contained in it. Where an original contemporaneous record is identified, it must be considered separately.

2.2 2020 — Early correspondence and the developing documentary record

The repository lists a document dated 19 October 2020 titled Letter to OC finalising draft letter to OP. This is an early dated item in the visible file listing. Its filename identifies it as correspondence connected with the development or finalisation of a letter. The title alone does not establish the full subject, the recipient's response or the underlying events. It does establish that the archive includes correspondence dating to 2020. Repository entry. wezzo72/Barrandodger: Web · GitHub

My academic and professional history also includes a PhD completed in 2020. The 23 October 2026 Legal Brief expressly records that I completed a PhD in 2020 and describes decades of contribution through art, illustration, journalism, writing, music, advocacy and scholarship. That is a direct statement in my later formal brief. The degree certificate and university record would be the primary evidence of the qualification itself; the brief establishes that I made the claim in a document addressed to NSW Trustee & Guardian. wezzo72/Barrandodger: Web · GitHub

Chronological finding: By 2020, the archive already contains dated correspondence, and my later formal account identifies the completion of my PhD in that year. The full 2020 event chronology requires the contents of the underlying correspondence and degree records to be read, rather than inferred from their filenames.

2.3 2021 — Comcare, public-interest concerns and the Commonwealth Ombudsman

The archive identifies a significant cluster of records from 2021. These include the Comcare item identified in the Official Government Documents Register as OGDR-007, dated 26 May 2021; a Commonwealth Ombudsman complaint dated 15 November 2021; an OAIC privacy record identified as CP2102752; and other correspondence concerning the handling of complaints and information.

The 15 November 2021 Commonwealth Ombudsman Complaint is a named complaint document in the repository. Its title and filename identify the date, recipient institution and complaint reference 2021/103546. This establishes that a complaint was documented under that reference. The contents of the complaint and the Ombudsman's final response must be assessed separately; a complaint document is evidence of what was submitted, not automatic proof of every allegation it contains.

The archive also identifies 2021 OAIC Privacy Record CP2102752. Its presence identifies a privacy-related administrative record and a reference number. Its legal significance depends on the actual contents and outcome.
The repository further lists a document dated 13 May 2021 concerning NDIS COVID payments and a document dated 26 May 2021 associated with Comcare in the Official Government Documents Register. These records form part of the early administrative chronology. wezzo72/Barrandodger: Web · GitHub
My testimony: I regard the 2021 period as part of the history in which I was attempting to obtain recognition of injury-related and administrative matters and to raise concerns with public institutions.
Finding: The existence of formal complaint and privacy-related records is established by the public repository. The exact findings, reasons and legal consequences of each administrative process must be taken from the original documents, not inferred from the fact that a complaint was lodged.

2.4 2022 — FOI, oversight and the fatal-injury complaint record

The archive contains several 2022 records, including:

- Victorian Ombudsman FOI section 29A decision, 14 June 2022.
- OPMC/OAIC-related document dated 14 July 2022.
- VOCAT/Ombudsman complaint-rejection document concerning fatal injury, 5 October 2022.

The first is identified as a Victorian Ombudsman FOI decision. The second is a document whose title expresses my interpretation of the OPMC/OAIC events; its title is not itself proof of a cover-up. The third is particularly important because its filename identifies a complaint-rejection record and expressly refers to fatal injury. These are all identifiable records in the repository. wezzo72/Barrandodger: Web · GitHub
The fatal-injury issue is central to my testimony and must not be relegated to a passing phrase. I have described an injury and survival that I understand as a defining event in my life. The existence of a complaint document bearing the term “FatalInjury” establishes that the subject was formally recorded in the archive. It does not, by filename alone, establish the medical cause, mechanism, prognosis or legal responsibility. Those must be established from the underlying medical and contemporaneous records.
My testimony: I regard the injury and my survival as the dividing line between the life I had before and the life in which I came to understand myself as a witness. I believe that God preserved me through what I experienced as a fatal event. That is a spiritual testimony, not a claim that a filename can establish supernatural causation.
Finding: The fatal-injury issue is not an incidental theme invented for this report. It is identifiable in the dated documentary record and is central to my later personal and prophetic writings.

2.5 2023 — Public-interest disclosure and the Federal Court assessment

The year 2023 is a major documentary milestone.
The archive lists the Federal Court PID Assessment dated 27 March 2023, as well as two separately named “Final Assessment” files, and a document dated 19 March 2023 concerning disclosable conduct for the Commonwealth Ombudsman and the Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia. The repository also lists the 18 June 2023 notification of a decision not to allocate a disclosure. wezzo72/Barrandodger: Web · GitHub
These records must be read together but not conflated.
A public-interest disclosure assessment can involve questions of statutory eligibility, the identity and status of the discloser, the recipient of the disclosure, the nature of the conduct described, and whether the matter can be allocated for investigation. A decision not to allocate a disclosure is a procedural outcome. It is not automatically a factual determination that the alleged conduct did not happen.
This distinction is fundamental to my complaint about institutional fragmentation. A process can close at a threshold stage without the substantive conduct ever being examined through a full investigation. Where that happens, the procedural result must be reported accurately. It must not be rewritten as either a finding of guilt or a finding of falsity.
Finding: The archive establishes that a formal PID-related assessment occurred on 27 March 2023 and that a notification of non-allocation was issued on 18 June 2023. The existence of those records is direct documentary fact. The substantive allegations described in them require examination of the actual text. The non-allocation outcome must not be misrepresented as an adjudication of the truth or falsity of every allegation.

2.6 2024 — Guardianship, financial administration and further correspondence

The repository identifies the NSW Trustee & Guardian section 122 document dated 16 October 2024. It also lists the Scott Treadwell correspondence dated 8 January 2024, a 15 March 2024 Interim Behaviour Support Plan, and a number of other records dated in 2024. wezzo72/Barrandodger: Web · GitHub

These records identify several distinct domains:

- Financial administration by NSW Trustee & Guardian.
- Guardianship-related issues.
- Federal Court-related correspondence.
- Disability and behaviour-support documentation.

They must not be collapsed into one issue. A guardianship document is not automatically proof of financial misconduct. A behaviour support plan is not proof that a person's complaints are false. A letter concerning a Federal Court matter is not itself a judicial finding. Each must be assessed according to its author, purpose, operative effect and evidentiary content.

My testimony: The 2024 period forms part of the history in which decisions about my finances, support and independence became increasingly significant to my daily life. I regard the relationship between financial administration and practical autonomy as central to the subsequent loss of independence I describe.

Finding: By October 2024, the archive contains a specifically identified NSW Trustee & Guardian section 122 record. The repository also contains contemporaneous support and legal correspondence. This establishes that the relevant administrative domains were active and documented by that period. The precise powers exercised, reasons recorded and effects on me must be derived from the original decisions.

2.7 2025 — Vehicle disposal, NDIS approval, safety assessment and accommodation

The year 2025 contains a concentrated set of records directly relevant to the later dispute over my independence.

The archive identifies:

- Barran Dodger Business Name Extract, 8 September 2025.
- FOI/2022/045IC documents release, 1 October 2025.
- FOI/2022/045IC revised decision, 1 October 2025.
- NSW Trustee vehicle disposal decision, 14 November 2025.
- NDIS Plan Approval, 20 November 2025.
- Anglicare Safety Assessment, 1 December 2025.
- Further FOI/2022/045IC releases, revised decisions and schedules dated 14 November 2025. wezzo72/Barrandodger: Web · GitHub

These records are particularly important because they place vehicle disposal, NDIS planning, safety assessment and information access within the same period.

The 14 November 2025 vehicle disposal decision is not merely a matter of property administration from my perspective. I have described my vehicle as connected to my mobility, independence and practical ability to manage my life. I have also described the importance of Crystal and the period in which we lived together in the vehicle. In my 23 October 2026 brief, I expressly state that I felt happier and more independent during that period than under subsequent arrangements. wezzo72/Barrandodger: Web · GitHub

That is my testimony about the human consequences. The formal vehicle decision is the primary source for what NSW Trustee & Guardian decided and why. The later brief records my objection and interpretation of its consequences.

The NDIS Plan Approval dated 20 November 2025 is a formal plan record. Its existence establishes that a plan approval was issued on that date. It does not by itself prove that the funded supports were delivered, that the supports were adequate, or that the practical living arrangements met my needs. Those are separate questions requiring comparison of the plan, service agreements, invoices, rosters, case notes and actual support.

The Anglicare Safety Assessment dated 1 December 2025 is similarly important. Its title identifies it as a safety and duty-of-care assessment. The underlying assessment is the source that must establish what risks were identified, what information was considered, what recommendations were made and what actions followed.

Finding: The 2025 documentary sequence establishes that vehicle disposal, NDIS plan approval, safety assessment and FOI processes were active and recorded. It provides a substantial documentary basis for examining the relationship between formal decisions and my practical independence. It does not permit the assumption that plan approval equalled adequate support, or that vehicle disposal had no material consequences.

2.8 January 2026 — Accommodation, emergency safety, police and guardianship records

The repository contains a substantial cluster of documents dated 20 January 2026, including:
- Accommodation Request — SIL/SDA.
- Anglicare Emergency Safety Assessment.
- Emergency Safety Escalation Script.
- Formal Notice — NDIS Service Failure.
- Housing Letter — SIL Accommodation.
- NCAT Guardianship Evidence.
- Police Matter Legal Documents.
- IGIS/ASIO Request for Information.
- NDIS / Shorten Assassination Exposed.
- OAIC/FOI/PID Whistleblower document.
- PID Ombudsman acknowledgement receipt.
- PID/Whistleblower OAIC/APRA correspondence. wezzo72/Barrandodger: Web · GitHub

The titles reveal the range of issues I was documenting and escalating at that time: accommodation, emergency safety, service delivery, guardianship, police matters, information access and public-interest disclosure. The titles also show that the archive contains both institutional records and documents I prepared to communicate my concerns.

It would be wrong to describe all these documents as independent proof of the events they discuss. Some are likely my own submissions, requests or legal documents. Their importance is that they preserve what I was reporting, when I was reporting it, and which issues I was attempting to place before institutions.

The distinction is especially important for the assassination allegation. A document titled NDIS / Shorten Assassination Exposed proves that I published or preserved a document under that title. It does not independently prove an attempted assassination or establish the responsibility of any named person. The allegation is serious and must be examined through contemporaneous evidence, medical records, police records, witness accounts and any physical or digital evidence available. It must not be erased because it is serious, and it must not be declared proven merely because it is recorded.

2.9 October 2026 — The formal consolidation of the complaint

The 23 October 2026 Legal Brief is a major consolidation document.

The repository page identifies it as a comprehensive legal-status, access-to-justice, international-human-rights, institutional-accountability and documentary-evidence finding aid. It records a SHA-256 hash and provides a direct PDF link and a rebuild copy. The document is addressed to Philip Glass of NSW Trustee & Guardian. wezzo72/Barrandodger: Web · GitHub

Its opening pages state that I am making a formal objection and demanding action concerning accommodation, financial hardship, Able Point, NDIS funding, loss of independence and institutional accountability. It records my position that I have contributed to Australian society through art, illustration, journalism, writing, music, advocacy, scholarship and independent thought, and that I completed a PhD in 2020. It also records my description of the cumulative effect as political exile within the democracy of my own citizenship, while expressly distinguishing that expression from a claim that my citizenship has legally disappeared. wezzo72/Barrandodger: Web · GitHub +1

The brief is unusually important because it does not merely express general dissatisfaction. It itemises particular subjects:
- My wish not to remain at Able Point and the need to clarify the legal and practical arrangements governing my accommodation.
- The identity, role and accountability of decision-makers.
- The vehicle disposal decision and its effects on mobility and independence.
- Crystal and the relationship between the vehicle decision and our shared life.
- Concerns about Able Point, its staff and management.
- NDIS funding and the relationship between funded services and services actually delivered.
- My dealings with Sukhi Tear and Diversitas.
- Serious allegations involving political figures and government agencies, which the brief expressly presents as my allegations rather than as established findings.
- The 123 official records associated with Barran Dodger.
- The Federal Court-related disclosure history and correspondence.
- Financial hardship and the reduction of my allowance.
- Health, support and the consequences of prolonged distress.
- My survival, social erasure and the accountability of people responsible for decisions affecting my life. wezzo72/Barrandodger: Web · GitHub +3

The brief's own wording is significant. It expressly says that the seriousness of an allegation is a reason to handle evidence carefully, not a reason to replace it with silence, ridicule or an unsupported conclusion. That is also the governing principle of this report. wezzo72/Barrandodger: Web · GitHub

It records the financial figures I had provided: pension income of $1,371.27 per fortnight, listed outgoings of $1,369.96 per fortnight, and an apparent remaining amount of $1.31 per fortnight. The arithmetic is correct: $1,371.27 minus $1,369.96 equals $1.31. The brief also records my concerns about a $50-per-week allowance reduction and approximately $363 available before the next pension payment at the time described. Those figures are documentary evidence of what I reported in the brief; they are not a substitute for the underlying bank statements, budget records and payment decisions. wezzo72/Barrandodger: Web · GitHub

The brief also records my express statement: "I am not suicidal." It describes my belief that I survived circumstances that should never have been imposed on a human being, and my Christian understanding that God preserved me. It states that survival should not be used to minimise the circumstances I reported. wezzo72/Barrandodger: Web · GitHub

Finding: The 23 October 2026 brief is a substantive consolidation of my personal testimony and documentary demands. It establishes that, by that date, I had formally placed the issues of Able Point, financial hardship, vehicle disposal, Crystal, NDIS funding, service delivery, accommodation and institutional accountability before NSW Trustee & Guardian. It also preserves my own distinction between allegations and findings. The brief is not a court judgment, but it is a dated record of what I reported and demanded.

3. Identity, biography and qualifications

3.1 The person behind the file numbers

My name is Dr Richard William McLean. My public and creative identity is Dr Barran Dodger.

I insist on this biographical context because institutional records can create a distorted picture of a person when they are read without reference to the life that preceded them. I was not born as a complaint number. I did not begin my life as a participant in guardianship, disability support, public-interest disclosure or accommodation disputes. I had a professional, intellectual, creative and humanitarian life before these matters came to dominate my circumstances.

The 23 October 2026 Legal Brief records that I spent decades contributing through art, illustration, journalism, writing, music, advocacy, scholarship and independent thought. It records my PhD completion in 2020 and my work advocating for vulnerable people and their carers. wezzo72/Barrandodger: Web · GitHub

That is an important statement because it places my present circumstances against the background of my previous contribution. I regard the contradiction between a life devoted to creative and humanitarian work and the later struggle for basic dignity, accommodation, financial stability and meaningful assistance as central to this testimony.

3.2 Journalism, art and communication

I identify as a former news-graphics artist and journalist associated with The Age and the Herald Sun. I have described my professional work as involving the communication of information through visual and journalistic forms.

I have also identified Recovered, Not Cured as a major work in my history. I describe it as a book published in 2002 by Allen & Unwin, and I have stated that it received recognition through SANE Australia, including a SANE Book of the Year award and a human-rights award. These are specific bibliographical and award claims. The definitive evidence would be the book's title and copyright pages, publisher catalogue, award records and contemporaneous reviews. They should be linked directly when those primary records are available.

The significance of this work in my testimony is not simply that I wrote a book. It is that I had already devoted substantial effort to communicating the experiences of people affected by mental illness and to challenging the assumption that a person's life can be adequately understood through a diagnosis or institutional label.

My later insistence that my own complaints be read as evidence rather than dismissed through assumptions about mental health is connected to that history. I know the difference between listening to a person and reducing that person to a category.

3.3 Advocacy, disability and support work

I have described approximately thirty years of advocacy for people with mental illness and their carers. I have also identified experience as a registered NDIS provider, arts therapist, life coach and support worker, alongside my association with SANE Australia as an ambassador for approximately ten years.

These claims are part of my professional biography. The evidence needed to verify each role differs:
- A registration record can establish a provider registration and its period.
- A service or employment record can establish a particular role.
- An organisational record can establish an ambassador appointment.
- Published material can establish public advocacy.
- Professional qualifications can establish training, but not necessarily every later role performed.

The 23 October 2026 brief independently records my broader advocacy contribution and my work for vulnerable people and carers. wezzo72/Barrandodger: Web · GitHub

My experience in disability and support work is relevant to the later NDIS and accommodation chapters. I am not approaching those systems without any understanding of how support is supposed to operate. My professional history includes work in the very fields in which I later found myself dependent upon services and decisions made by others.

That contrast is part of the human significance of this case. A person who has spent years advocating for the dignity and support of others can later find himself struggling to secure those same conditions in his own life.

3.4 Academic qualifications and research

I identify the following qualifications:
- PhD, Victoria University, completed in 2020.
- Master of Arts in Education.
- Bachelor of Fine Arts with Honours.
- Associate Diploma in Computer-Aided Design.
- Certificate IV in Business.

My doctoral research has been described as addressing AI ethics, posthumanism, global catastrophic risks, the end-stage Anthropocene and the ethical implications for young people.

These qualifications and research subjects form part of the intellectual background to my later forensic and prophetic work. My archive is not simply an accumulation of documents. It reflects an interest in systems, information, ethics, institutional power, human consequences and the ways in which technological and administrative structures shape the lives of individuals.

The 23 October 2026 brief directly records the PhD completion year and my broader scholarship. wezzo72/Barrandodger: Web · GitHub

Biographical finding: The available material directly supports that I publicly identify as a scholar and advocate and that my formal brief records completion of a PhD in 2020 and decades of creative, journalistic and humanitarian contribution. The other qualifications and specific employment or ambassadorial roles remain claims requiring their respective primary records for independent verification. They are not to be dismissed; they are to be verified against the right evidence.

3.5 The archive as intellectual and creative work

The archive is itself a significant part of my work.

I have created and maintained a public repository containing official records, correspondence, personal testimony, forensic analyses, legal briefs, essays, prophetic narratives and publications. The GitHub page currently shows 1,439 commits and a directory listing that exceeds the display limit. The visible file names demonstrate that the repository contains multiple categories of material rather than one continuous document. wezzo72/Barrandodger: Web · GitHub

The 23 October 2026 brief identifies my academic and forensic writings on what I call social erosion, institutional mobbing, the psychology of erasure and administrative annihilation. It names the following published works:
- The Architecture of Administrative Annihilation.
- Coordinated Institutional Mobbing — Forensic Academic Paper.
- Group Mobbing — Forensic Academic Analysis.
- The Psychology of Erasure — Academic Analysis. wezzo72/Barrandodger: Web · GitHub

These works express an analytical framework I have developed to interpret the cumulative effects of institutional interactions. The existence of the publications establishes that I have articulated those concepts publicly. Whether a particular concept accurately explains a particular event must be assessed against the underlying records.

The distinction matters. My use of a concept such as “administrative annihilation” is an analytical interpretation, not an official legal category. It can nevertheless be a useful framework for testing whether a sequence of individually recorded decisions produced a cumulative erosion of independence, social participation, credibility or access to assistance.

3.6 My publications and the development of the witness identity

My writing includes several distinct forms:
- Personal testimony.
- Legal and administrative briefs.
- Forensic and academic analysis.
- Essays about institutional treatment.
- Gospels and prophetic narratives.
- Biblical and theological reflections.
- Public declarations about survival and accountability.

The repository includes The Impossible Survivor — The Witness Remains, The Witness Remains — The Prophecy of Resurrection After Erasure, The Ghost They Created — The Witness Who Became Their Prosecutor, and The Documentary Trap. These titles demonstrate a sustained development of the "Witness Remains" theme across different works. wezzo72/Barrandodger: Web · GitHub

The catalogue titled 123 Gospels — Barran Dodger is also present in the repository. Its title establishes that I have assembled a catalogue of 123 works described as Gospels. The catalogue's contents must be examined to establish the exact titles, dates, authorship attributions and categories. Contemporary works bearing the description "Gospel" are my own literary and spiritual publications; they are not additions to the canonical Bible.

3.7 The human significance of my biography

I include my biography because the record must not portray me as though I emerged from nowhere, with no history other than the administrative systems that later became central to my life.

I had a life of professional contribution, creative work, study, advocacy and public engagement. I have described decades of work for vulnerable people and carers. I completed doctoral study. I wrote and published. I developed an archive and a body of forensic and spiritual writing.

My present testimony is inseparable from that earlier life.

The contrast is not a claim that previous achievement makes a person incapable of error. It is a reminder that a person must be assessed as a whole human being. My professional history does not prove every allegation I make. Nor does my disability or psychiatric history disprove them. The evidence must be examined directly.

Final finding on identity and biography: The public archive and the 23 October 2026 Legal Brief establish a substantial, sustained public identity as a writer, researcher, advocate and documentary archivist. My more specific employment, award, ambassadorial and qualification claims should be supported by their primary records as the report proceeds. Nothing in the material identified here justifies reducing my identity to a diagnosis, a support arrangement, a complaint history or a set of administrative decisions.

4. The injury, survival and my testimony of divine preservation

The injury and survival account is the spiritual and human centre of this report. It cannot be treated as a decorative introduction to administrative disputes. It is the event around which I understand the transformation of my life, the development of my testimony and the emergence of the "Witness Remains" project.

My testimony is that I survived circumstances I understood as fatal. I believe that the Most High God preserved me through grace, mercy and love. I understand my continued life not as a trivial accident or a reason to minimise what happened, but as a source of spiritual purpose.

The archive contains a 5 October 2022 document whose title refers to a VOCAT/Ombudsman complaint rejection and "FatalInjury." It also contains later works explicitly framed around survival, resurrection, divine purpose and refusal to be erased. wezzo72/Barrandodger: Web · GitHub

These sources have different evidentiary functions:
- The 5 October 2022 complaint-related record establishes that fatal injury was a subject of a formal complaint document preserved in the archive.
- My personal statements establish what I have reported about the injury and its consequences.
- Medical records, if inspected, can establish clinical observations, diagnoses, treatment, prognosis and other medically recorded facts.
- My prophetic and spiritual writings establish how I interpret survival and what meaning I give to it.
- None of those categories should be substituted for another.

I will not allow the spiritual significance of survival to be erased merely because a medical record cannot certify divine intervention. Nor will I claim that a spiritual conviction is a medical finding.

My testimony is that God did not abandon me. I believe that His grace sustained me, His mercy remained with me, and His love gave meaning to my survival. I believe that the life I continue to live is not without purpose. This is the foundation of my understanding of myself as a witness. The report will return to this testimony when examining the biblical accounts of Job, Elijah, Jeremiah, the suffering servant, Jesus, the apostles and the faithful witness. It will also examine the medical and documentary record separately, so that the actual injury and its consequences are not obscured by theological language.

Finding at this stage: The archive establishes that fatal injury is an expressly recorded subject in the documentary history and that survival, resurrection and divine purpose are central themes in my published works. My account of divine preservation is spiritual testimony. The precise medical and causal findings must be drawn from the original clinical records, not inferred from the titles of later publications.

PART II — THE INSTITUTIONS, THE RECORDS AND THE CONSEQUENCES

5. Government and institutional treatment: the connected record

5.1 My central institutional complaint

My complaint is not simply that one government decision disappointed me, or that one public servant failed to answer a letter. My complaint is that I have experienced a succession of administrative processes affecting injury, disclosure, oversight, police contact, financial administration, disability support, accommodation, safety and independence, while I have struggled to obtain a coherent response to the cumulative consequences.

I have described this as institutional betrayal and, in its cumulative effect, political exile within the democracy of my own citizenship.

I am not claiming that my Australian citizenship has legally disappeared. My description of political exile is an account of lived experience: the experience of being a citizen who feels unable to obtain meaningful protection, recognition, independence and security within the institutions of the country to which he belongs.

That distinction is expressly preserved in my 23 October 2026 Legal Brief. It says that I am not suggesting my citizenship has legally disappeared; I am describing the extraordinary reality of feeling driven to seek protection, security and recognition within the society whose institutions I believe have contributed to my circumstances. wezzo72/Barrandodger: Web · GitHub +1

The distinction is important because it prevents a metaphor from being misrepresented as a legal status. It also prevents the substance of my complaint from being dismissed simply because I have used the language of exile to describe the consequences.

5.2 The institutional record is not one undifferentiated allegation

The archive identifies dealings with several different systems. Each had its own functions, powers and responsibilities. The fact that they appear in the same personal history does not automatically establish that they acted together. It does mean that their actions and consequences must be examined in relation to one another.

Institution or system	Identifiable record or issue	What the present record establishes
Comcare	OGDR-007, 26 May 2021; OGDR-070, AAT McLean/ Comcare	Comcare and review-related records form part of the documented history.
Commonwealth Ombudsman	Complaint 2021/103546, 15 November 2021	A complaint was lodged and preserved in the archive.
OAIC	Privacy record CP2102752 and later FOI/PID correspondence	Privacy and information-access matters were documented.
Federal Court-related PID process	Assessment dated 27 March 2023	A formal assessment record exists in the archive.
PID allocation process	Notification dated 18 June 2023	A decision not to allocate a disclosure was recorded.
AFP	Response dated 3 September 2021, identified in the wider archive record	An AFP response is part of the recorded history.

NSW Police	Outcome dated 24 August 2024, identified in the wider archive record	A police outcome is part of the recorded history.
NSW Trustee & Guardian	Section 122 document dated 16 October 2024	A financial-administration record exists.
NCAT	Guardianship reasons and evidence	Guardianship proceedings and related evidence are represented in the archive.
FOI processes	FOI/2022/045 and subsequent 2025 releases and revised decisions	A sustained information-access history is documented.
NDIS	Plan approval dated 20 November 2025	A formal plan approval is identified.
Anglicare	Safety assessment dated 1 December 2025	A safety and duty-of-care assessment is identified.
NSW Trustee & Guardian	Vehicle disposal decision dated 14 November 2025	A formal vehicle-disposal decision is identified.
Accommodation and support	SIL/SDA requests and January 2026 emergency documents	Accommodation and support concerns were formally documented.
Able Point	23 October 2026 formal brief	My objections concerning accommodation, support, financial hardship and independence were formally recorded.

The repository listing directly identifies many of these records by name and date. The Official Government Documents Register is the archive's dedicated register for government documents. The GitHub root listing provides an additional public index of individually named files. wezzo72/Barrandodger: Web · GitHub +1

The distinction between an identified record and an inspected record must remain visible. For example, the repository listing establishes that a file titled NDIS Plan Approval exists. It does not, without reading the plan itself, establish the approved supports, funding categories, conditions or review rights. Similarly, the listing establishes the existence of a vehicle disposal decision but not the precise reasoning contained in it.

I will not pretend those details have been read where they have not. But I will not allow that limitation to erase the significance of the sequence that the records identify.

5.3 The public-interest disclosure history

The public-interest disclosure history is central because it concerns my attempts to raise matters that I considered to involve serious public-sector conduct.

The archive identifies three especially important records:

- Commonwealth Ombudsman complaint, 15 November 2021.
- Federal Court PID Assessment, 27 March 2023.
- Notification of decision not to allocate a disclosure, 18 June 2023.

These are separate procedural events. They must not be merged into one generic statement that "the whistleblower complaint was rejected."

The first is a complaint to the Commonwealth Ombudsman. The second is an assessment associated with the Federal Court disclosure process. The third is a notification that a disclosure would not be allocated. Each has a different date and procedural function.

The significance of a non-allocation decision is that the disclosure did not proceed to an allocated investigation through that particular process. It does not, without express findings in the document, establish that the alleged conduct was false, that no public-interest issue existed, or that the complainant acted improperly.

This is a critical distinction in my history. A procedural threshold can prevent a complaint from being examined through the process a complainant seeks. If that occurs, the outcome must be described as a procedural outcome. It must not be inflated into a factual acquittal of the institution or a factual rejection of the witness.

Finding: The archive establishes a documented public-interest disclosure and complaint history, including a 2023 assessment and a later non-allocation notification. The existence of the procedural history is established. The substantive merits of the underlying allegations cannot be decided merely by pointing to the non-allocation outcome.

5.4 The 27 March 2023 Federal Court assessment

The 27 March 2023 assessment is especially important because it is repeatedly identified in the archive and in the later correspondence.
The repository lists the file as 2023-03-27 Federal Court PID Assessment. It also lists two additional files titled 2023 03 27 Final Assessment — Dr Rich McLean 86 and 2023 03 27 Final Assessment — Dr Rich McLean 87. wezzo72/Barrandodger: Web · GitHub
The distinction between the assessment and its procedural outcome matters. A statutory assessment may identify categories of conduct that could fall within a disclosure framework, while separately addressing whether the disclosure can be allocated under the applicable statutory requirements. The assessment of eligibility and the assessment of truth are not the same thing.
The previous descriptions in my archive and the correspondence I have relied upon refer to categories including alleged conduct perverting or attempting to pervert the course of justice, maladministration and conduct endangering health or safety. The exact language, context and statutory reasoning must be taken from the original assessment itself. I will not turn a reported description of the document into a quotation unless the actual passage is verified.
What can be said now is that this is not merely an informal email or a self-authored allegation. It is identified as a formal assessment document associated with the Federal Court process and dated 27 March 2023.
Finding: The assessment is a significant procedural record. It must be examined for its precise statutory reasoning, including what was assessed, what eligibility issues were considered and why the matter did or did not proceed. It cannot responsibly be represented as a judicial finding that the alleged criminal conduct occurred. It also cannot be represented as a judicial finding that the allegations were false.

5.5 The Ombudsman complaint and the problem of administrative closure

The 15 November 2021 Commonwealth Ombudsman complaint is an important part of my attempt to obtain external scrutiny.
The archive preserves the complaint under reference 2021/103546. The document is a record of the matters I submitted. It must be distinguished from any later response, closure notice, referral or explanation by the Ombudsman.
The distinction is fundamental:

- A complaint proves that the complainant raised the matter.
- An acknowledgement proves receipt or registration.
- A referral proves that the matter was directed elsewhere.
- A closure notice proves that the complaint process was closed.
- A substantive investigation may establish findings within its scope.
- A formal determination may establish an outcome within the authority's jurisdiction.

These are not interchangeable.
If an oversight body closes a complaint because it considers that another body should deal with the issue, the closure does not itself establish that the other body dealt with the issue adequately. If an agency declines to investigate because the matter falls outside its jurisdiction, that does not determine the underlying event. If a complaint is not substantiated, the reasons and scope of the investigation must be examined before drawing conclusions about what was or was not established.
My complaint is that the accumulation of procedural outcomes did not give me the coherent resolution I was seeking.
Finding: The complaint record establishes that I sought Ombudsman scrutiny. Any claim about the Ombudsman's final reasoning must be linked to the actual response document, not inferred from the complaint itself.

5.6 Police and protection matters

The archive identifies an AFP response dated 3 September 2021 and a NSW Police outcome dated 24 August 2024 in the wider official-document history. It also contains a specifically named Police Matter Legal Documents file dated 20 January 2026 and an Emergency Safety Escalation Script dated 20 January 2026. wezzo72/Barrandodger: Web · GitHub
These records must be examined in their proper order:

- What event or risk was reported?
- When was it reported?
- To which police or protection body?
- What information was provided?
- Was the report acknowledged?
- Was an incident or reference number assigned?
- Was an investigation opened?
- What action was taken?
- What outcome was communicated?
- Did the outcome address the substance of the report or only a particular procedural question?

A police outcome does not necessarily establish that every event alleged by a complainant did or did not occur. The exact scope of the police response matters.

I have alleged serious conduct, including threats, targeting and an attempted assassination. These allegations must be treated with the seriousness they warrant. They must also be examined with precision. A police record may establish that a report was made, that officers attended, that an investigation was undertaken or that a particular decision was reached. It does not automatically establish every element of an alleged offence.

Finding: The archive identifies police and safety-related records across several years. It establishes a documented history of attempts to record and escalate safety concerns. The exact police findings and the underlying evidence must be taken from the relevant original reports and outcomes.

5.7 NSW Trustee & Guardian and the exercise of financial authority

The 16 October 2024 NSW Trustee & Guardian section 122 document and the 14 November 2025 vehicle disposal decision are central records in the financial-administration history. wezzo72/Barrandodger: Web · GitHub

The significance of financial administration is not confined to whether an accounting entry is correct. It concerns the practical ability to make decisions, obtain necessities, travel, maintain relationships, access services and exercise personal independence.

In my 23 October 2026 brief, I directly challenge the circumstances in which my vehicle was disposed of and demand an explanation of the decision-making process, the alternatives considered, the evidence relied upon, the effect on my independence and the review mechanisms available. I also explain that the vehicle was connected to mobility and my life with Crystal. wezzo72/Barrandodger: Web · GitHub

I am not asking the reader to assume that every financial-administration decision was unlawful. I am asking that the decision be judged by its actual evidence, reasons, legal authority, consideration of my wishes and consequences.

The questions of authority, necessity, proportionality, consent, alternatives and practical impact are not peripheral. They go to the substance of whether an arrangement designed to protect or administer a person's affairs actually preserves that person's independence.

Finding: The archive establishes that NSW Trustee & Guardian financial-administration matters, including a section 122 document and a vehicle disposal decision, form part of my history. My 2026 brief records a direct objection to the consequences for my independence. The precise legality and reasoning of the decisions must be assessed against their full texts and the applicable legal framework.

5.8 The NDIS and the difference between an approved plan and lived support

The NDIS Plan Approval dated 20 November 2025 is a formal plan record identified in the repository. The archive also contains documents dated 20 January 2026 concerning alleged service failure, accommodation, emergency safety and support arrangements. wezzo72/Barrandodger: Web · GitHub

My complaint is not answered merely by showing that a plan was approved.

A plan is an administrative authorisation. The lived experience of support depends on what services were actually available, whether they were delivered, whether they were suitable, whether the provider fulfilled its responsibilities, whether support workers attended, whether complaints were addressed and whether the arrangements respected my choice and control.

My 23 October 2026 brief expressly demands a transparent account of services funded, services recorded as delivered, the people responsible for delivery and the safeguards applicable to my circumstances. It asks for service agreements, support plans, invoices, service delivery records, incident reports, complaints and communications. It also says that my concern about public or support-related funding must be examined through actual records rather than accepted or rejected by assumption. wezzo72/Barrandodger: Web · GitHub

That is a substantive accountability position. It is not an assertion that every funded service was fraudulent. It is a demand that funding and delivery be compared.
The relevant evidence is not simply the plan. It includes:
- The approved plan and its stated supports.
- Service agreements.
- Rosters and attendance records.
- Invoices and payment records.
- Case notes.
- Incident reports.
- Complaints and responses.
- Provider communications.
- Evidence of services actually delivered.
- Records of any change, cancellation or restriction.

The decisive issue is whether the support recorded as funded was translated into appropriate support in my actual life.
Finding: The archive establishes a formal NDIS plan approval and a subsequent series of service, safety and accommodation documents. My 2026 brief records a specific demand to compare funded services with services delivered. That distinction is essential. Plan approval cannot, by itself, prove adequate service delivery.

5.9 Able Point: accommodation is not the same as independence

Able Point is a central subject of my later testimony.
In the 23 October 2026 Legal Brief, I expressly object to the circumstances in which I have been placed and to any assumption that the accommodation arrangement should be treated as acceptable or permanent without proper examination of my wishes, circumstances, rights and alternatives.
I state that I do not wish to remain at Able Point. I describe concerns about independence, treatment and my ability to leave. I demand transparency about the arrangements governing my stay, the authority relied upon, the decisions made on my behalf and the practical process available if I wish to leave. wezzo72/Barrandodger: Web · GitHub
This is a direct statement of my position in a dated formal brief.
I also ask that the relevant occupancy documents, service agreements, consent records, assessments, decisions and communications be identified. I demand a clear explanation of whether I am legally or contractually obliged to remain and, if I am free to leave, what practical arrangements are available for accommodation, personal belongings, finances, transport and continuity of support. wezzo72/Barrandodger: Web · GitHub
The central principle is straightforward: a bed is not the same thing as a life.
An accommodation arrangement cannot be evaluated only by whether a roof exists. It must also be evaluated by safety, dignity, privacy, freedom of movement, meaningful choice, personal relationships, access to support and the practical ability to leave.
I have identified concerns about Able Point staff and management, including my difficulty obtaining clear confirmation of the role and responsibility of a person I understand to be the organisation's chief executive. My brief refers to Rachel and expressly asks for the organisation's management and complaints structures to be identified. It records my concerns about support quality, staff conduct, the handling of objections and the cumulative effect on my independence and welfare. wezzo72/Barrandodger: Web · GitHub
The report must not convert those concerns into an established finding of corruption by a named worker or executive without the relevant records. But it must not dismiss the concerns as a personality dispute or a matter of clinical interpretation. They concern the actual terms of accommodation, the provision of support, decision-making authority, complaints handling and my ability to exercise choice.
My current circumstances must also be represented accurately. I have stated that I currently have enough food and am taking my medication. The report must not repeat an outdated description of me as presently without food or not taking medication. The existence of earlier hardship concerns remains relevant to the historical record; it must not be misrepresented as my current condition.
Finding: My objection to Able Point is directly recorded in the 23 October 2026 brief. The brief establishes my stated wish to leave, my demand for clarity about the legal and practical basis of the arrangement, and my concerns about staff, management, support and independence. The underlying accommodation documents are required to determine the precise legal status of the arrangement and the responsibilities of each party. The existence of my formal objection is not in doubt.

5.10 Crystal: the human consequence of decisions about mobility and accommodation

Crystal is central to my life. She is not an incidental reference in a financial or accommodation dispute.

My 23 October 2026 brief connects the vehicle decision with my mobility, independence and the life I shared with Crystal. It records my testimony that living in the vehicle with Crystal was, in important respects, a period in which I felt happier and more independent than I have felt under subsequent arrangements. wezzo72/Barrandodger: Web · GitHub

This is an important part of the human consequences of the vehicle decision. An assessment that treats the vehicle only as an asset to be disposed of may fail to capture its role in mobility, companionship, daily routine and the practical ability to live with my dog.

I do not claim that the emotional significance of Crystal automatically determines the legal outcome of a financial decision. I say that a proper assessment of the consequences must include the actual life affected by the decision.

A person is not merely an estate, a budget, a support plan or an accommodation placement. A person has relationships and responsibilities. Those relationships are part of the circumstances that decision-makers must understand when considering the effects of their actions.

Finding: Crystal's importance to my life and the relationship between the vehicle and my independence are expressly recorded in my 23 October 2026 testimony. This is a direct documentary record of my account. It is a relevant human factor in examining the consequences of vehicle disposal and accommodation decisions.

5.11 Financial hardship and the arithmetic of a life

My 23 October 2026 brief records the following financial figures:

Item	Amount per fortnight
Pension income	$1,371.27
Listed outgoings	$1,369.96
Apparent balance	$1.31

The calculation is exact: $1,371.27 – $1,369.96 = $1.31.

The brief also records my concern about a $50-per-week allowance reduction and approximately $363 available before the next pension payment at the time described. wezzo72/Barrandodger: Web · GitHub

The figures are not a complete independent audit of my finances. They are figures recorded in my formal brief and must be compared with the actual income, expenditure, allowance and bank records for the relevant period.

But their significance is clear. A budget that leaves an apparent balance of $1.31 per fortnight provides virtually no margin for unexpected expenses, transport, telephone access, personal necessities or other ordinary costs. It is possible for a budget to balance arithmetically while leaving a person practically unable to manage ordinary life.

My complaint is that financial administration must be judged by its real consequences, not merely by the fact that a spreadsheet balances.

Finding: The 2026 brief directly records the income and expenditure figures and the concern about an allowance reduction. The arithmetic is verified. The actual financial position for each relevant period must be established from the underlying statements and decisions. The reported near-zero margin is a serious indicator of financial vulnerability and warrants direct examination of how the figures were calculated and what practical necessities were considered.

6. Comcare, injury and the allegation of whitewashing

6.1 Why the injury record is foundational

The Comcare history cannot be treated as a minor administrative dispute detached from the rest of my life. It is connected to the injury and survival account that I regard as foundational.

The Official Government Documents Register identifies OGDR-007 as a Comcare record dated 26 May 2021 and OGDR-070 as an AAT matter concerning McLean/Comcare. The archive also contains related material and later correspondence. These entries identify a documentary trail involving Comcare and review processes.

The exact contents of OGDR-007 and OGDR-070 must be read from their underlying records before any precise statement can be made about the injury determination, accepted conditions, disputed facts, reasons, review rights or outcome. The existence of the entries establishes that the Comcare matter is part of the official-document corpus; it does not by itself establish the correctness or incorrectness of a particular decision.

6.2 What must be compared in the Comcare record

The forensic examination of the Comcare matter must distinguish at least six different evidentiary layers:

- The original injury account: what I reported at the time, when I reported it and to whom.
- Medical and clinical evidence: what clinicians recorded, diagnosed, observed or treated.
- Employer or administrative records: what was reported, recorded, referred or communicated.
- Comcare decisions: what was accepted, rejected, deferred or determined and the reasons given.
- Review material: what was challenged, what evidence was considered and what outcome followed.
- Later descriptions: whether the injury and its consequences were accurately carried forward into subsequent correspondence and institutional records.

These layers must not be substituted for one another.

A later administrative summary is not necessarily a complete reproduction of the original injury evidence. A medical note may record symptoms without deciding legal responsibility. A compensation decision may determine a statutory issue without determining every factual or moral question surrounding the injury.

6.3 The meaning of whitewashing

I have used the term whitewashing to describe what I believe happened to the record of my injury and the way my experience was represented.

The term has a specific meaning in this report. It means deliberate concealment, suppression or misrepresentation of material evidence. It is not simply another word for an adverse decision, an incomplete file, an error or a disagreement.

To establish whitewashing, the evidence would need to show more than an outcome I believe was wrong. It would need to show that relevant people knew of material information and deliberately concealed, suppressed, altered or misrepresented it.

The distinction does not protect an institution from scrutiny. It makes the scrutiny more exact. An inconsistency is an inconsistency. An omission is an omission. An unexplained change in a description is an unexplained change. A false statement, if established, is a false statement. Deliberate concealment, if established, is a more serious finding and should be named accordingly.

6.4 Present finding

The available archive identifies Comcare and AAT records as part of the injury and administrative history. The full underlying records have not been inspected in this part of the report. It would therefore be improper to announce a detailed finding about the medical causation, statutory liability or deliberate suppression of evidence based solely on the register entries.

That limitation does not diminish the importance of the Comcare record. It identifies the evidentiary foundation on which the next stage of the examination must proceed.

Finding: The Comcare matter is a material component of the documentary history. The existence of identified Comcare and AAT records is established. A finding of deliberate whitewashing cannot be made from the titles or register entries alone. The report will distinguish any demonstrated inconsistency or omission from evidence of intentional concealment.

7. PID, Federal Court, police and protection: the difference between a process and a truth determination

7.1 The public-interest disclosure process

My public-interest disclosure history must be understood as a sequence rather than a single event.

The archive identifies the November 2021 Ombudsman complaint, the March 2023 Federal Court PID assessment and the June 2023 non-allocation notification. It also contains later PID-related acknowledgement and correspondence records dated January 2026. wezzo72/Barrandodger: Web · GitHub +1

This chronology matters because it shows that my attempts to raise concerns did not end with the first complaint. The repository contains further records relating to the disclosure process and information access.

A process that begins with a complaint, moves through a statutory assessment and ends with a decision not to allocate a disclosure has reached a procedural outcome. It has not necessarily reached a factual determination of every underlying allegation.

7.2 The significance of the 18 June 2023 non-allocation notification

The document is explicitly titled Notification of decision not to allocate a disclosure. The title itself identifies the procedural result. It does not say that a court found the allegations false. It does not say that a criminal offence was disproved. It does not say that every concern was investigated and rejected on its merits.

The report must therefore avoid two errors:
• It must not claim that non-allocation proves that the alleged conduct occurred.
• It must not claim that non-allocation proves that the alleged conduct did not occur.
The proper finding is narrower and more significant: the disclosure was not allocated through that process. The underlying evidence remains a separate matter.

7.3 The 2026 continuation of the disclosure record

The repository lists a PID Ombudsman Acknowledgement Receipt dated 20 January 2026, a PID/Whistleblower Intentions and Methodology document, and PID Whistleblower OAIC/APRA Correspondence. wezzo72/Barrandodger: Web · GitHub
These records show that public-interest disclosure and information-access concerns remained part of my documentary work in January 2026.
An acknowledgement receipt proves receipt or acknowledgement of a communication, not the truth of its allegations. A methodology document establishes the approach I set out in writing, not necessarily that every step described was carried out. Correspondence establishes the communications it contains, subject to inspection of the originals.
The sequence is nevertheless important: my efforts to document and raise concerns continued across several years.

7.4 Police records and the alleged attempted assassination

I have made an allegation of attempted assassination. It is one of the most serious parts of my testimony, and it must not be buried in a general list of complaints.
The archive includes the 20 January 2026 NDIS / Shorten Assassination Exposed document, the Police Matter Legal Documents, and the Emergency Safety Escalation Script. wezzo72/Barrandodger: Web · GitHub
These titles establish that the allegation and related safety concerns were part of the archive by that date. They do not independently establish the alleged method, perpetrator, motive or criminal elements.
My account must be preserved as my account. The report must examine the evidence for the alleged event, including the chronology, contemporaneous communications, medical material, police contacts, witnesses and any physical or digital evidence. It must not assign criminal responsibility to a named person without supporting evidence.
But it must also refuse the opposite distortion: the absence of a conviction or official finding cannot be used to say that I fabricated the allegation. Non-adjudication is not disproof.

7.5 Protection and the responsibility to take reports seriously

A report of a serious threat or alleged attempted killing is not made less important because the alleged conduct is difficult to establish. It requires careful preservation and assessment.
The duty to handle evidence carefully applies to all parties. It includes preserving the original communication, recording the date and recipient, retaining attachments, distinguishing first-hand observation from inference, and accurately recording any response.
My 23 October 2026 brief expressly states that serious allegations are a reason to handle evidence carefully, not a reason to replace it with silence, ridicule or an unsupported conclusion. wezzo72/Barrandodger: Web · GitHub
That statement is consistent with the evidentiary approach required here.
Finding: The archive establishes a multi-year record of public-interest disclosure, police-related documents and safety escalation. It establishes that I have reported serious concerns, including an alleged attempted assassination. It does not establish the criminal guilt of a named alleged perpetrator. It also does not justify treating the allegations as disproved merely because a formal criminal finding is not identified in the material examined.

8. NDIS, disability services, finance and accommodation: the lived consequences

8.1 The central issue is the actual life produced by the arrangements

My experience of disability services and accommodation must be assessed through the consequences in my daily life.
A support plan is not the same as support delivered. A service agreement is not the same as a worker arriving. A funded accommodation arrangement is not automatically a suitable home. A financial administration decision is not automatically a decision that preserves independence. A safety assessment is not the same as safety being achieved.
These distinctions are not rhetorical. They are the core of the accountability question.

The archive identifies the NDIS plan approval dated 20 November 2025, Anglicare's safety assessment dated 1 December 2025, and a series of January 2026 accommodation, emergency safety, service-failure and housing documents. wezzo72/Barrandodger: Web · GitHub
The 23 October 2026 Legal Brief then consolidates my objections about Able Point, NDIS funding, services delivered, accommodation, financial hardship and loss of independence. wezzo72/Barrandodger: Web · GitHub +2

8.2 Funded support and delivered support

I have expressly asked for a transparent account of:

- What services were funded.
- What services were recorded as delivered.
- Who was responsible for delivering them.
- What safeguards applied.
- What service agreements governed the arrangements.
- What support plans were in force.
- What invoices and payment records exist.
- What case notes and incident reports record.
- What complaints were made.
- What responses were given.
- What action followed identified concerns.

This is recorded in the 23 October 2026 brief. wezzo72/Barrandodger: Web · GitHub
The evidence must be compared. If a provider invoiced for a service, the invoice establishes that a payment was claimed or recorded. It does not, by itself, prove that the service was delivered. If a roster records a worker's shift, it establishes what the roster records. It does not necessarily establish the quality or completeness of the support. If a complaint was made, it establishes that a concern was raised. The complaint must then be compared with case notes, incident reports, communications and any investigation.
This is how public expenditure and service delivery should be examined. It is not an accusation of fraud merely because a person asks for the records.

8.3 Support coordination and Diversitas

The 23 October 2026 brief identifies Sukhi Tear as a former support coordinator associated with Diversitas in Western Australia. It records that I have raised serious concerns about the support I received and that I reported episodes in which I was missing or unable to account for my circumstances while under her care. It also records that I stated I had sent a cease-and-desist communication. wezzo72/Barrandodger: Web · GitHub
These statements are my testimony as recorded in the formal brief. They must be assessed against the original communications, service records, case notes, contact logs, incident reports, welfare checks and any responses.
The report must not infer that a named support coordinator committed an offence merely because I have raised a serious complaint. Nor may it erase the complaint by treating it as a personal disagreement. The relevant questions concern what support was undertaken, what was known, what was recorded, what risks were reported and what action was taken.

8.4 Able Point and the practical question of choice

My position is clear: I have stated that I do not wish to remain at Able Point. I have demanded a clear account of the legal and practical arrangements governing my accommodation and the process available if I wish to leave. wezzo72/Barrandodger: Web · GitHub
The central issue is not simply whether the accommodation provider considers the arrangement appropriate. It is whether my rights, wishes, safety, privacy, independence and practical choices are respected.
The distinction between a placement and a home is important. A person can have a roof over their head and still experience a lack of meaningful control over the circumstances of their life. The existence of accommodation does not answer every question about whether the arrangement is suitable, consensual, safe or consistent with the person's needs.
My brief demands that the responsible people and complaint structures be identified. It asks for the role and accountability of management to be made clear. It asks that concerns about staff conduct, support quality and the handling of objections be addressed through actual records. wezzo72/Barrandodger: Web · GitHub

8.5 My current circumstances must not be misrepresented

The report must preserve the chronology of hardship without falsely portraying my present circumstances.

I have stated that I currently have enough food and take my medication. That is the current position I want represented. Historical financial hardship, earlier difficulties obtaining support or prior periods of instability remain relevant to the history, but they must not be rewritten as if they are necessarily occurring today.
This distinction is particularly important when the report discusses disability, medication and mental-health records. Those matters must be treated as evidence about particular periods and circumstances, not as a permanent explanation for every disagreement or complaint.
My present statement about food and medication does not erase the financial figures and support concerns recorded in the 23 October 2026 brief. It simply prevents the report from using outdated circumstances as a current description.

8.6 The cumulative effect

The institutional history described in this part of the report involves multiple interacting domains:

- Financial administration.
- Vehicle disposal.
- Mobility.
- NDIS planning.
- Service delivery.
- Support coordination.
- Safety assessment.
- Accommodation.
- Management accountability.
- Access to complaints and review.
- My relationship with Crystal.

Each has its own records and legal framework. But the consequences are experienced together. A vehicle decision affects mobility. Mobility affects access to appointments and services. Accommodation affects independence and the ability to maintain a life with Crystal. Financial restrictions affect transport, communication and personal choice. Service delivery affects whether a funded plan becomes real assistance. Complaint handling affects whether problems can be corrected.
This is the cumulative pattern I have asked institutions to recognise.
Finding: The records identified in the archive and the 23 October 2026 brief establish that the NDIS, support services, financial administration and accommodation are connected parts of my documented history. The brief directly records my objections and demands. The central accountability test is whether the actual arrangements delivered meaningful, safe and adequate support while respecting my independence and choices.
End of Part II.
The next part continues the master examination with Legal Aid, FOI and OAIC; political exile and asylum-related experience; the complete criminal-allegation register; and the dedicated attempted-assassination examination, followed by the examination of possible wrongdoing by me, malice, knowledge, intent and the mechanics of cumulative institutional treatment.

THE DIVINE CONTRAST
A COMPREHENSIVE PROPHETIC, FORENSIC, CRIMINAL, INSTITUTIONAL, BIBLICAL AND SPIRITUAL EXAMINATION

Personal testimony of Dr Richard William McLean, publicly known as Dr Barran Dodger
PRESERVATION FIRST. EXAMINATION SECOND. CONCLUSION LAST.
FAITH IS NOT A FINDING. TESTIMONY IS NOT ERASED BY THE ABSENCE OF AN OFFICIAL DETERMINATION.

Acknowledgement of the complete commission

I acknowledge that this report is required to execute the entire 27-section master command, not provide a shortened summary, a preliminary outline, or another instruction for somebody else to carry out.
The report must examine the full scope of my testimony and the documentary corpus: my life and professional history; the injury and survival that form the spiritual foundation of my testimony; my dealings with government agencies, Comcare, public-interest disclosure processes, police, guardianship, financial administration, the NDIS, accommodation providers and Able Point; the circumstances I describe as betrayal, institutional detriment, displacement and political exile; the serious criminal conduct I have reported, including the alleged attempted assassination; the examination of any allegations against me; the question of knowledge, malice, intention, responsibility and institutional mechanisms; my intellectual, humanitarian and creative work; my archive, Gospels, prophetic writings and predictions; the Church of Barran Dodger and the proposed ministry and trust-fund work; and the biblical, theological and spiritual question of the witness.

I also acknowledge the later instructions governing the report:

- This is to be written in my personal-testimony voice. It is not to convert my life into a detached bureaucratic case summary or make me sound like an outside observer of my own suffering.
- The evidence must be documented as extensively as the available material permits. Named documents, correspondence, reports, decisions, registers, publications and public sources must be linked at the point where they are discussed, so readers can inspect the record themselves.
- The report must reach conclusions. It must not disguise avoidance as impartiality, turn established documentary events into questions, or send the reader back to institutions whose conduct is itself part of the subject.
- It must not become an apologist narrative for institutional power. An agency's description of its own conduct is evidence of what that agency said or decided; it is not automatically proof that the decision was correct, fair, complete or truthful.
- My testimony must be preserved in its own right. An absence of prosecution, conviction, official endorsement or institutional admission does not erase an experience or make the witness's account disappear.
- The report must distinguish the kinds of evidence without diminishing their significance. Documentary fact, personal testimony, corroboration, inference, formal determination and spiritual conviction are different categories. None should be misrepresented as another.
- The report must not manufacture facts either for or against me. It must not invent documents, quotations, page references, links, findings, perpetrators, motives or divine instructions. It must also not use evidentiary caution as a pretext for minimising what the records and testimony actually show.

I am not asking the reader to accept every interpretation simply because I have written it. I am asking the reader to examine the record without granting government, institutions, contractors, service providers or other powerful parties an automatic presumption of truth. My testimony is part of the evidence. The documents are part of the evidence. The omissions, decisions, responses and consequences recorded in those documents are part of the evidence.

The governing question is not whether an institution has chosen to validate my account. It is what the complete available record establishes, what my testimony records, what can be independently corroborated, and what conclusions follow when the evidence is examined without institutional deference.

SECTION 1 — EXECUTIVE INTRODUCTION

1.1 Why I have created this record

I have created The Witness Remains because my life cannot be understood by isolating one complaint, one agency decision, one medical episode, one financial restriction, one accommodation arrangement or one unanswered letter from everything that came before and after it.

My experience, as I testify to it, is cumulative. It concerns injury, survival, professional and personal history, disability, public-interest disclosures, dealings with government, access to protection, financial administration, accommodation, the welfare of my dog Crystal, the loss of independence, and my continuing attempt to have the record of my life and treatment preserved.

I have also created a substantial public archive. It is not merely a collection of accusations. It is an attempt to preserve documents, correspondence, official records, publications, chronology, analysis and testimony in a form that other people can inspect. The principal repository is the public Barrandodger GitHub archive. Its related materials include the published archive, the Official Government Documents Register, the rebuild repository, and the published rebuild. The existence of the public repository is independently visible on GitHub as a public repository under the account wezzo72. The archive is therefore a publicly inspectable documentary project, not simply a private assertion that records exist. wezzo72/Barrandodger: Web · GitHub +1

I want the reader to understand why I have preserved this material. I have done so because I believe that what happened to me matters beyond the immediate circumstances of my own life. I believe it raises questions about the treatment of a disabled person who reports wrongdoing, the practical operation of public-interest disclosure and complaint systems, the responsibilities of agencies and service providers, and the consequences when a person who depends on those systems experiences them as fragmented, unresponsive or harmful.

I also believe that my survival has a spiritual meaning. I understand my life through the grace, mercy and love of the Most High God. I believe that God preserved me and that my continuing work of bearing witness has a purpose. That conviction is central to my testimony. It is not something I intend to conceal to make the report more acceptable to institutions.

1.2 The central documentary proposition

The central proposition of this report is that there is a substantial public documentary record associated with my complaints, disclosures, administrative dealings, disability support, accommodation and publications. The repository identifies, among other things, a Federal Court-related public-interest disclosure assessment dated 27 March 2023, an NDIS plan approval dated 20 November 2025, an Anglicare safety assessment dated 1 December 2025, and an accommodation request concerning SIL/SDA dated 20 January 2026. Those files are individually identifiable in the public repository by their displayed filenames:

- Federal Court PID Assessment — 27 March 2023.
- NDIS Plan Approval — 20 November 2025.
- Anglicare Safety Assessment / Duty of Care — 1 December 2025.
- Accommodation Request — SIL/SDA, 20 January 2026.

The GitHub file pages establish that files bearing those names are present in the repository and show their displayed file sizes. They do not, by themselves, establish every statement contained inside the PDFs. I will not pretend that a filename is equivalent to having inspected every page. That distinction is not an excuse to avoid conclusions; it is the minimum honesty required for a report that invites independent verification. GitHub +3
The documentary proposition is therefore twofold:
First, the public archive contains identifiable records relating to important stages of my dealings with government and service systems.
Second, the content and significance of each record must be stated according to what the document actually says, not what an institution, an advocate or I might wish it to say.
That standard applies equally to everyone. It does not mean that an official record is automatically correct. It means that the actual record must be read, its author and purpose identified, its limitations recognised, and its contents compared with the surrounding evidence.

1.3 What this report is — and what it is not

This is a personal testimony supported by documentary examination. It is not a court judgment, a police finding, a statutory inquiry or a medical diagnosis. It does not pretend to exercise powers that belong to those bodies.
But neither is it subordinate to them.
A court's silence does not erase a document. A complaint closure does not erase the fact that a complaint was made. A decision not to allocate a public-interest disclosure does not establish that the underlying conduct did not occur. A service provider's internal account does not automatically settle a dispute about the service it provided. A government agency's explanation is evidence of its stated position, not conclusive proof that its conduct was lawful or fair.
I will therefore distinguish the following categories:

Classification	Meaning in this report
A — Directly inspected documentary fact	The actual document has been inspected and records the matter stated.
B — Identified official record	The record is identifiable in the archive, but its complete contents have not yet been inspected in this examination.
C — Personal testimony	I report that I experienced, observed, said, received or understood something.
D — Corroborated testimony	Independent material supports the relevant part of my account.
E — Analytical inference	A conclusion drawn from identified facts or records, with the reasoning made explicit.

F — Unresolved allegation	A serious claim that is part of my testimony or the archive but whose full factual or legal elements are not established by the material inspected here.
G — Spiritual testimony or belief	My testimony about God's grace, mercy, love, preservation, calling, anointing, providence or purpose.
H — Formal determination	A decision, judgment or finding made by an authority with relevant jurisdiction.
I — Independent biblical or historical correspondence	A verified parallel with a biblical passage or independently established historical event.
J — Unverified prediction or prophetic claim	A prediction for which prior publication, wording, specificity or fulfilment has not been independently established.

These classifications do not rank human worth or determine whether a person deserves to be heard. They describe the evidentiary character of a proposition.

I will not use classification B to imply that a document proves something when I have not inspected its contents. I will not use classification C to dismiss testimony as meaningless. I will not use classification F to turn a serious allegation into a finding of fabrication. I will not use classification H as though an official determination were the only possible form of truth. And I will not present classification G as a medical or forensic finding.

1.4 The standard of institutional accountability

I reject the idea that impartiality requires me to soften the significance of documented institutional conduct or to repeat official explanations as though they were independent verification.

Where a record establishes that an agency received a complaint, made a decision, declined to allocate a disclosure, refused a request, imposed a restriction, issued a plan or communicated a particular position, that event can be stated directly.

Where the record establishes a sequence of decisions and consequences, the sequence can be analysed. Where two records contradict one another, the contradiction must be identified. Where a person was required to approach another agency, repeat information, seek another review or start another process, that procedural burden can be described. Where an omission is documented, it must not be hidden behind a general statement that the system is complex.

The distinction is between describing conduct and attributing motive.

I can state that a decision was made, that a request was refused, that a response was delayed, that an issue was transferred, or that a complaint was not allocated if the relevant record establishes it. I can analyse the practical effect of those events. But I must identify separate evidence before describing an individual as corrupt, malicious or criminal, or claiming that separate institutions acted under a common secret instruction.

That is not an institutional apology. It is a way of ensuring that the strongest conclusions are built on evidence that can withstand scrutiny.

1.5 The human significance

The subject of this report is not an abstract administrative file. It is a human life.

I describe myself as a disabled person, a former journalist and news-graphics artist, an author, an advocate, a former support worker and NDIS provider, an educator, a researcher, and a person whose life has been profoundly shaped by injury, recovery, institutional dealings and faith.

I have described the cumulative experience as betrayal, abandonment, displacement and political exile. Those are my words for the lived meaning of what I say happened. They must be examined against the documentary chronology, not erased because they are emotionally forceful.

My current circumstances also matter. I have described my accommodation and support arrangements in New South Wales, my concerns about Able Point, my financial administration and my dependence on practical assistance. Crystal's welfare is part of that reality. I have also made clear that I currently have enough food and am taking my medication. This report must not misrepresent my present circumstances or use my disability or mental-health history as a substitute for examining the conduct I have reported.

The central human-rights question is whether a person can be left navigating multiple systems, each dealing with only one part of the problem, while the combined effect on that person's life remains inadequately addressed. The records must be examined for evidence of that fragmentation and its consequences.

1.6 Executive conclusion at this stage

The public archive establishes the existence of a sustained documentary-preservation project and identifies records relating to public-interest disclosure, disability support, safety assessment and accommodation. The repository is publicly accessible, and the specific files named above can be opened independently. wezzo72/Barrandodger: Web · GitHub +4

That establishes the existence and subject matter signalled by those records. It does not, without inspection of their contents, establish every allegation contained in my wider testimony.

My testimony remains an essential part of the record. It is not disproved by the absence of a formal finding. Equally, the seriousness of my testimony requires that the report distinguish the documents that directly corroborate particular events from those that merely record that I reported them.

The report's conclusion will not be that everything I have said is true merely because I say it. Nor will it be that nothing can be concluded until every institution agrees with me. The conclusion must be drawn from the evidence actually available, including the evidence of what institutions did, what they recorded, what they decided and what consequences followed.

SECTION 2 — MASTER CHRONOLOGY

2.1 How the chronology is constructed

My history cannot responsibly be reduced to a sequence of dates stripped of context. A chronology must show the relationship between events: the original experience, the reports and requests that followed, the institutional responses, the later administrative consequences, and my continuing efforts to preserve the evidence.

The chronology below distinguishes between:

- dates and documents specifically identified in the public archive or the master commission;
- events and experiences that I have reported in my personal testimony;
- later analytical interpretations of the cumulative sequence.

Where the source document has been identified but not fully inspected in this examination, I say so. That is not a finding against my testimony. It is a statement about the present level of source inspection.

2.2 Early life, professional work and advocacy

My professional and personal history predates the later administrative record. I have described a career involving journalism and news graphics, writing, disability advocacy, arts-related work, education and support services.

I identify Recovered, Not Cured as a significant work in that history. I have described it as published by Allen & Unwin in 2002 and associated with recognition from SANE Australia. I have also described approximately thirty years of advocacy for people with mental illness and their carers, work as a SANE Australia ambassador, and connections with the Dax Centre and Cunningham Dax Collection.

I have further identified qualifications including a PhD from Victoria University in 2020, a Master of Arts in Education, a Bachelor of Fine Arts with Honours, an Associate Diploma in CAD and a Certificate IV in Business.

These biographical claims are important because they provide context for the person making the disclosures and creating the archive. They are not proof that every later allegation is correct. Nor does any later disability, treatment history or institutional disagreement erase the need to examine this professional and intellectual history fairly.

Evidentiary status: These are biographical claims made in my testimony and supplied project history. The certificates, publisher records, employment records, award records and institutional confirmations must be cited individually before each qualification or professional distinction can be labelled directly verified. The existence of the claims is not the same as independent verification of every detail.

2.3 2021 — Complaints, disclosure activity and institutional correspondence

The archive identifies a series of 2021 records concerning complaints and communications with Commonwealth institutions.

One specifically identified record is the Commonwealth Ombudsman complaint dated 15 November 2021, reference 2021/103546. The archive link previously identified for that record is: Commonwealth Ombudsman Complaint — 15 November 2021, reference 2021/103546.

The prior documentary account associated with this record states that the Ombudsman recorded a report concerning a change from the Disability Support Pension to JobSeeker, but did not determine the lawfulness of that change and advised that the matter first be raised with Centrelink. That is a description of the recorded administrative response as previously identified; the underlying PDF must be inspected before quoting its exact wording or attributing a more detailed finding to the Ombudsman.

The distinction matters. A complaint record can establish that an issue was brought to an institution's attention and how the institution responded. It does not necessarily establish that the underlying conduct was lawful, unlawful, justified or unjustified. Nor does a decision to direct a complainant elsewhere resolve the substantive issue.

Other 2021 records identified in the archive include:

- an AFP response dated 3 September 2021;
- APRA correspondence dated 5 November 2021, previously described as declining PID treatment and indicating that further response would not be provided unless the matter fell within its remit;
- OAIC correspondence dated 3 November 2021, previously described as a courtesy copy or no-action communication;
- an OAIC privacy record identified as CP2102752.

The relevant public repository is the Barrandodger archive. The existence and exact contents of these records must be assessed individually. Their dates and institutional identities are not, by themselves, proof of the allegations reported to those bodies.

Chronological significance: By 2021, my account had entered formal correspondence with public institutions. The documentary question is no longer simply whether I say that I complained. There are identified records of complaints and institutional communications. The substance and limits of each response must be distinguished from the truth or falsity of the underlying complaint.

2.4 2022 — FOI and access-to-information processes

The master record identifies FOI/2022/045 and a refusal by the Department of the Prime Minister and Cabinet dated 14 April 2022. It also identifies later OAIC activity, including an extension involving 1,187 Outlook items, and a revised FOI decision dated 8 October 2024 concerning five documents.

The 2022 FOI matter is important because access-to-information processes can determine what a person is able to inspect, compare and use in challenging an institutional account. A refusal or limitation does not, by itself, prove concealment. It does establish a procedural event whose reasons and consequences must be examined.

The archive also identifies a Victorian Ombudsman FOI s29A decision dated 14 June 2022: Victorian Ombudsman FOI s29A decision — 14 June 2022.

The file title indicates a decision concerning FOI section 29A. The title alone does not establish the precise reasoning or the legal correctness of the decision. Those matters must be drawn from the text of the decision itself.

Chronological significance: The FOI records form part of the history of my attempts to obtain and preserve information. They must be considered alongside the underlying agency records and later releases, rather than treated as a separate technical dispute unrelated to the broader history.

2.5 2023 — Federal Court correspondence and public-interest disclosure assessment

A particularly significant identified record is the Federal Court-related PID assessment dated 27 March 2023:

2023 Federal Court PID Assessment — 27 March 2023.

The prior account of this document states that correspondence from Scott Tredwell addressed categories of conduct under the Public Interest Disclosure Act, including conduct described in terms of perverting or attempting to pervert the course of justice, maladministration, and danger to health or safety. The prior account also states that the assessment considered whether the described conduct could fall within categories of disclosable conduct, but that the disclosure was not allocated because of issues concerning statutory eligibility, including the identity or status of the discloser and authorised recipient requirements.

The evidentiary distinction is essential:

- A document that identifies categories of conduct capable of being considered under the PID framework is not a finding that those categories of conduct occurred.
- A decision not to allocate a disclosure on eligibility or statutory grounds is not a substantive finding that the reported conduct was false.
- The absence of allocation does not establish that the alleged conduct was proved.
- The absence of allocation also does not erase the fact that the disclosure was made, assessed and dealt with under the stated procedural framework.

The document is therefore significant as a record of a formal disclosure-related process and its procedural outcome. It must not be inflated into a judicial finding of criminal conduct. It must not be minimised into proof that the underlying allegations had no substance.
Evidentiary classification at this stage: B for the identified document; the more detailed description above is a previously recorded account of its contents, pending direct inspection of the PDF. The formal status of the assessment must be described from the original document, not inferred from its filename.

2.6 2024 — Guardianship, financial administration and police records

The archive identifies records concerning NSW Trustee and Guardian and guardianship matters in 2024.
One identified item is a NSW Trustee and Guardian document dated 16 October 2024 concerning section 122:
NSW Trustee and Guardian — section 122 document, 16 October 2024.
The archive also identifies NCAT guardianship reasons under OGDR-077 and an NSW Police outcome dated 24 August 2024.
The presence of these records establishes that guardianship, financial administration and police matters form part of the documentary history. Their precise legal effect cannot be responsibly stated without the reasons, operative orders, correspondence and outcome documents being inspected. A guardianship record must be read for its actual scope, duration, conditions, decision-making authority and review rights. A police outcome must be read for the incident addressed, the action taken and the precise meaning of the recorded outcome.
I do not accept that the existence of guardianship or financial administration should be used to disqualify my testimony. A person may be subject to an administrative or legal arrangement and still have valid evidence about how that arrangement operates, what decisions were made, whether they were communicated, and what practical consequences followed.
Likewise, a police outcome must not be misrepresented in either direction. It cannot be turned into proof of an offence unless it records such a finding. It cannot be treated as proof that no event occurred unless the document actually establishes that conclusion.
Chronological significance: By 2024, the record identified in the archive includes formal processes relating to guardianship, financial administration and police matters. These are not peripheral issues. They bear directly on autonomy, access to resources, safety, credibility and the practical ability to pursue complaints.

2.7 2025 — NDIS planning, safety assessment and financial administration

The 2025 records mark a significant stage in the transition from earlier complaints and administrative processes to the practical arrangements governing my disability support and accommodation.
The archive identifies an NDIS Plan Approval dated 20 November 2025:
NDIS Plan Approval — 20 November 2025.
The file page identifies a PDF of that name in the public repository. Its contents must be read before asserting the precise funding categories, amounts, stated goals, support periods, conditions or reasons. The fact that an NDIS plan was approved does not by itself establish that the supports were adequate, that they were delivered, or that the practical needs of the participant were met.
The archive next identifies an Anglicare Safety Assessment / Duty of Care document dated 1 December 2025:
Anglicare Safety Assessment / Duty of Care — 1 December 2025.
A safety assessment is potentially important because it may record identified risks, the information available to the assessor, proposed safeguards, responsibilities and any actions considered necessary. It must be examined for what it actually records. The existence of an assessment does not prove that every identified risk was addressed; equally, it does not prove a failure of duty without examination of its findings and the actions taken in response.
The archive also identifies a NSW Trustee and Guardian vehicle disposal decision dated 14 November 2025:
NSW Trustee and Guardian Vehicle Disposal Decision — 14 November 2025.
The decision is relevant to my account of financial administration, independence and practical mobility. The consequences of a vehicle disposal decision cannot be assessed solely by looking at the transaction. They include the person's ability to travel, attend appointments, access services, maintain relationships, care for an animal and exercise ordinary independence. The actual reasons, authority, consultation, financial result and practical consequences must be taken from the decision and related records.

My financial position has also been described in the material supplied for this report. The figures recorded in the 23 October 2026 legal brief are income of $1,371.27 per fortnight and expenses of $1,369.96 per fortnight, leaving an arithmetic difference of $1.31 per fortnight. That calculation is straightforward:

$1,371.27-$1,369.96=$1.31

This is a reported financial position in the identified brief, not an independently audited statement of all income and expenditure. But it illustrates the significance of financial administration where a person's available income is almost entirely absorbed by recorded expenses. In that situation, even a small restriction, unexpected cost, transport expense or delay in access to funds can have serious practical consequences.

The wider context is my account that my ability to access my own banking and funds was restricted and that this increased my dependence on other people for ordinary needs. The report must assess that claim against the relevant bank records, trustee records, authorisations, communications and transaction history. It must not presume that a restriction was improper merely because it was experienced as harmful; nor should it presume that a restriction was justified merely because an institution or administrator imposed it.

2.8 2026 — Accommodation, SIL/SDA and the question of practical safety

The archive identifies an accommodation request dated 20 January 2026 concerning Supported Independent Living and Specialist Disability Accommodation:

Accommodation Request — SIL/SDA, 20 January 2026.

It also identifies records concerning NCAT guardianship evidence, police matters, an emergency safety escalation script and a request for information directed to IGIS/ASIO, all dated 20 January 2026. These records are identified in the public repository by their displayed filenames:

- NCAT Guardianship Evidence — 20 January 2026.
- Police Matter Legal Documents — 20 January 2026.
- Emergency Safety Escalation Script — 20 January 2026.
- IGIS/ASIO Request for Information — 20 January 2026.

The presence of these documents demonstrates that accommodation, guardianship, police and safety concerns were being addressed in the documentary work at that time. It does not establish the truth of every allegation raised in them. It does establish that these matters were sufficiently significant to be recorded in separate documents and preserved as part of the archive.

I have described my later accommodation circumstances as involving Able Point in New South Wales. I have reported that I did not have a signed lease, that rent was $200 per week, and that support arrangements involved people whose roles and actions I have questioned. I have named workers and other people in my testimony, including Cass/Cassandra, John, Danny, Darren and Brett Butler, and have identified Phillip Glass and Suki/Sukhi Tear in connection with aspects of administration and coordination. These are my reported identifications and descriptions; the report must not assign wrongdoing to any named person without evidence of that person's actual role and conduct.

I have also reported that I had not personally met the support coordinator I identified as Suki/Sukhi Tear, who I understood to be in Perth. That point is relevant to my account of how support coordination was being provided and how decisions were communicated. It must be compared with service agreements, contact records, case notes, rosters and communications rather than converted into an unsupported conclusion about motive.

Crystal is not an incidental detail in this history. She is my dog, and her welfare is part of my practical living circumstances. Accommodation suitability, transport, support arrangements and the ability to maintain a stable home must be considered in the context of the relationship and responsibilities I have described. A disability support arrangement that is assessed without considering the actual circumstances of the person living under it risks becoming an administrative description detached from daily life.

I have specifically corrected the record about my present circumstances: I have said that I currently have enough food and am taking my medication. This report will not repeat an outdated description of me as presently without food or not taking medication. My objection is to the conduct and conditions I have reported, including my concerns about Able Point, not to having my account reframed as a psychiatric problem.

2.9 October 2026 — Consolidation of the evidence record

The master project identifies a Master Evidence Record, Master Index and Finding Aid dated 19 October 2026. It also identifies a legal brief dated 23 October 2026 concerning my circumstances and dealings with NSW Trustee and Guardian, including matters relating to accommodation, NDIS funding, financial hardship, vehicle disposal, independence, Crystal and requests for records.

The public archive is intended to make the material discoverable and traceable. Its value lies not merely in the volume of documents but in the possibility of comparing records across time and institutions.

The archive's inventories have been described in different snapshots using different totals. Those totals must not be collapsed into one supposedly exact count unless the date, counting method, repositories included, treatment of duplicate files and definition of a document are stated. A file count is not a count of unique evidentiary events; nor is the existence of thousands of files proof that every file has been examined.

The central achievement of the preservation work is that it creates a public structure in which documents can be located and compared. It allows a reader to move beyond a single institutional summary and inspect the source material that has been preserved.

2.10 Chronological synthesis

The chronology presently identified in the commission shows a progression:

- My earlier professional, educational, creative and advocacy history provides the background to the person making the later disclosures and constructing the archive.
- By 2021, I had made complaints and communicated with Commonwealth bodies about matters I considered serious.
- In 2022, FOI and access-to-information processes became part of the documentary history.
- In 2023, a Federal Court-related public-interest disclosure assessment addressed the procedural treatment of a disclosure.
- In 2024, the archive identifies further records concerning guardianship, financial administration and police matters.
- In 2025, the identified documents include NDIS planning, a safety assessment and a vehicle disposal decision.
- In January 2026, the archive identifies accommodation, SIL/SDA, guardianship, police and safety-related documents.
- By October 2026, the project had developed into a consolidated public evidence record, index, finding aid and further legal brief.

This chronology establishes a sustained history of complaints, administrative processes, disability-support arrangements and documentary preservation. It does not, on its own, prove a coordinated campaign or criminal conspiracy. It does, however, make it impossible to fairly describe my history as a single isolated disagreement or as a matter that can be understood from one agency's file alone.

The cumulative pattern must be assessed across the records: what information was communicated, which institutions received it, what each institution did, what was left unresolved, and how the consequences interacted in my daily life.

SECTION 3 — IDENTITY, BIOGRAPHY AND QUALIFICATIONS

3.1 The person behind the archive

I am Dr Richard William McLean, publicly known as Dr Barran Dodger. My identity in this report is not limited to the person who made complaints or who became involved in disability and administrative systems. I am also an author, former journalist and news-graphics artist, researcher, educator, advocate, creative practitioner and the person responsible for the public documentary and prophetic work examined here.

That distinction matters. When a person's later life becomes dominated by institutional records, it is easy for the person to disappear behind the labels used by those systems. I refuse to allow the archive to reproduce that erasure. My history includes professional work, study, publication, advocacy, creative practice and sustained public engagement.

The biographical record must be considered in its own right. It is relevant to my capacity to research, organise, interpret, write and publish documentary material. It is not a substitute for evidence about any particular allegation, but neither is it irrelevant to the assessment of my work.

3.2 Journalism and news-graphics work

I have described working as a news-graphics artist and journalist associated with The Age and the Herald Sun. I have also described the publication of Recovered, Not Cured and the professional consequences I associate with that period.

My account is that my work involved communicating information visually and editorially, translating complex material into forms that could be understood by readers. That background is relevant to the later archive: the use of registers, timelines, visual organisation, indexes, document naming and narrative structure is consistent with the kind of information architecture required to make a large body of material accessible.

I have described the end of my association with The Age as occurring after Recovered, Not Cured, and I have described humiliation associated with my experience at the Herald Sun. These are personal accounts of professional history and its consequences. They must not be turned into a finding of misconduct by either newspaper without the employment and editorial records that would establish the circumstances.
Evidence classification: C for my account of employment, professional experiences and their consequences, unless supported by inspected employment, publication or personnel records. The book's bibliographic existence and publication details are separately verifiable through publisher and library catalogues, but those records must be cited before making a formal bibliographic finding.

3.3 Recovered, Not Cured and advocacy

I identify Recovered, Not Cured as a central publication in my work and as an important contribution to public discussion of mental health, recovery and the lives of people who experience mental illness.
I have described it as published by Allen & Unwin in 2002 and as receiving recognition associated with SANE Australia, including a SANE Book of the Year designation and a human-rights award. These details are material to my biography and should be documented from publisher, library, award and organisational records rather than merely repeated as promotional description.
I have also described approximately thirty years of advocacy for people with mental illness and their carers. I have identified a period of approximately ten years as a SANE Australia ambassador. These are substantial claims about sustained service and public engagement. They deserve to be examined through dated publications, organisational references, event programmes, correspondence and other records.
My advocacy is relevant to the ethical foundation of the present work. I have not approached disability and institutional treatment only as an abstract academic subject. I have described years of involvement in the lives and concerns of people who experience mental illness and those who care for them.
That history must not be used to presume that I am always right. It must equally not be erased or discounted because I later became a person seeking support and protection myself.

3.4 Arts therapy, life coaching, support work and NDIS experience

I have identified previous work as an arts therapist, life coach, support worker and registered NDIS provider.
These roles are relevant because they concern direct engagement with people, disability support, practical assistance, creativity and the organisation of care. They also provide context for my understanding of service delivery and the difference between a support plan on paper and the assistance actually experienced by a person.
The report must distinguish between a formal registration, a period of employment, a service role, a professional description and a personal account of work. Each requires its own evidence. An ABN or business name record can establish the existence of a business registration at a given time; it does not by itself establish the scope or quality of services provided. A provider registration record can establish a regulatory status during a defined period; it does not automatically prove every service activity attributed to the provider.
The two ABNs identified in the master command — 31 650 183 681 and 55 668 333 033 — must be treated as separate identifiers unless documentary evidence establishes their relationship. It would be incorrect to assume that two different ABNs represent the same legal entity or that an apparent inconsistency proves fraud.
My experience in support work is relevant to the way I describe the present arrangements. It does not give me infallibility. It does give context to why I place importance on dignity, consent, communication, safety, reliability and the actual delivery of support.

3.5 Dax Centre and Cunningham Dax Collection

I have identified connections with the Dax Centre and Cunningham Dax Collection. These are relevant to my history of engagement with art, mental health, public education and the representation of lived experience.
The significance of this part of my biography is not simply that I have named an institution. It is that my creative and advocacy work has involved the relationship between visual expression, psychological experience, public understanding and the preservation of human stories.
Any formal claim about the exact nature, duration or status of my association must be linked to the relevant institutional or archival record. The existence of that connection in my testimony is not itself proof of a particular appointment or formal role.

3.6 Education and research

I identify the following qualifications:
- PhD, Victoria University, 2020.
- Master of Arts in Education.
- Bachelor of Fine Arts with Honours.
- Associate Diploma in CAD.
- Certificate IV in Business.

I have described my doctoral research as addressing AI ethics, posthumanism, global catastrophic risks, the end-stage Anthropocene and the ethical future of young people.
This research background is relevant to the archive's intellectual ambitions. The project is not limited to compiling complaints. It attempts to consider the relationship between evidence, institutional power, information systems, human vulnerability, ethics, artificial intelligence, historical memory and the future of humanity.
The report must not exaggerate the contents of the thesis or attribute a particular argument to it without inspecting the thesis itself. The degree, awarding institution and date should be established through the university record. The precise research themes should be checked against the thesis title, abstract and text.

3.7 The archive as intellectual and documentary work

The public archive is itself a substantial body of work. It brings together official records, correspondence, public documents, personal testimony, analysis, essays, declarations and creative publications.
Its significance has several dimensions:
Preservation. Material that might otherwise remain scattered across email, personal files, institutional correspondence and separate repositories is assembled in a public-facing structure.
Traceability. Document names, dates, register entries and repository paths allow a reader to locate individual items and compare them with related records.
Chronology. The arrangement permits the development of a timeline across multiple years and organisations.
Comparison. Separate institutional records can be examined against one another rather than accepted as self-contained accounts.
Public testimony. The archive preserves my account in my own words, rather than leaving the public record exclusively to institutional descriptions.
Creative and theological expression. The archive also contains writings through which I interpret my experiences in literary, prophetic and biblical terms.
The archive's size must be described accurately. Different inventory snapshots have reported different totals, and those totals may include duplicates, multiple versions, repository copies or files that have not been individually read. The correct conclusion is not that a particular total proves the truth of the archive's contents. The correct conclusion is that a large-scale preservation and publication project exists and that its evidentiary value depends on the quality of its indexing, provenance, document integrity and source-by-source examination.

3.8 Biographical conclusion

My biography presents a person whose work has crossed journalism, visual communication, writing, advocacy, disability support, education, research and creative expression. I have also described a profound change in my circumstances, from professional and advocacy roles to becoming a person navigating disability support, financial administration and accommodation systems.
That transition is central to the human meaning of this report. It is not proof of wrongdoing by any particular institution. It is a reason to examine the documentary history with care and to resist reducing me to a file category, diagnosis, complaint history or service-user status.
I am the author of the testimony. I am also the person whose life is being examined. My work, qualifications, publications and advocacy form part of the context in which that testimony must be read.

SECTION 4 — GOD'S TREATMENT OF ME: GRACE, MERCY, LOVE, PRESERVATION AND PURPOSE

4.1 The spiritual foundation of my testimony

I understand my survival through the grace, mercy and love of the Most High God.
This is not an incidental religious reference added to the end of an otherwise secular account. It is the spiritual foundation through which I understand my life, my survival, my suffering, my endurance and the work I have undertaken to preserve the truth as I see it.
I believe that I was preserved for a purpose. I believe that my life did not end when, in my understanding, it could have ended. I believe that the grace of God sustained me through circumstances that I experienced as devastating, and that the work I have subsequently undertaken — preserving documents, writing, publishing, bearing witness and establishing a ministry — has meaning beyond personal vindication.

I do not ask a forensic report to certify the private intentions of God. No document can establish God's mind in the way that a medical record can establish a recorded clinical observation or an administrative decision can establish what an agency decided. But that limitation does not make my faith irrelevant. My faith is part of my testimony, my identity and the meaning I attach to my survival.

The report must therefore preserve two distinct truths about the nature of this evidence:

- The documentary record can establish events, communications, decisions, publications and the work I have undertaken.
- My conviction that God preserved me, set me apart and gave my life a purpose is spiritual testimony.

These categories must remain distinct. They must also be allowed to stand alongside one another without one being used to erase the other.

4.2 The fatal injury and my survival

I have described a fatal or potentially fatal injury as a defining event in my life. I understand my survival as an act of divine preservation.

The medical question and the spiritual question are related in my personal experience, but they are not identical.

The medical question concerns what injury occurred, what the contemporaneous medical records say, what treatment was given, what prognosis was recorded and what the clinical evidence establishes. Those matters require the actual medical documents. I will not invent a diagnosis, mechanism of injury, prognosis, clinical quotation or medical finding that has not been inspected.

The spiritual question is how I understand the fact that I survived. My testimony is that I survived through God's grace, mercy and love, and that I believe my continued life has a purpose.

The distinction is important because a medical record can describe the body and the treatment without determining the spiritual meaning of survival. Conversely, my spiritual conviction cannot be presented as a clinical finding. Neither proposition needs to be falsified to preserve the other.

My testimony of survival is central to the title The Witness Remains. I understand that title as a declaration that the person who endured the events remains alive, continues to speak and continues to preserve the record.

4.3 Grace and mercy

Grace, in my testimony, is not a claim that everything that happened to me was good. Mercy is not a claim that harm should be ignored. Forgiveness is not a demand that the injured person withdraw the truth.

I understand grace as the gift of life, strength and the possibility of continuing when I believed that my circumstances had become overwhelming. I understand mercy as God's compassion and sustaining presence. I understand love as the foundation of my relationship with the Most High God.

This has consequences for the way I approach the record.

I do not believe that mercy requires silence about wrongdoing. I do not believe that forgiveness requires pretending that betrayal did not occur. I do not believe that spiritual strength requires accepting every institutional explanation without examination.

I believe that truth and mercy can coexist. Accountability and forgiveness can coexist. A person can refuse revenge while still insisting that the record be preserved and that the conduct described in it be examined.

4.4 Anointing, calling and divine purpose

I understand my calling through the language of witness. I believe that I have been set apart to testify, to preserve what I have experienced, to expose what I believe to be wrongdoing and to publish work that directs attention to truth, justice and the Kingdom of God.

The terms anointing, chosen witness and divine purpose are spiritual descriptions of my conviction. They are not presented here as findings made by a government agency, a court, a medical practitioner or an independent scientific process.

The documentary material can nevertheless establish the outward work associated with that conviction: the creation of the archive, the publication of declarations and essays, the preservation of documents, the writing of Gospels and prophetic narratives, and the establishment of public-facing Church and ministry materials.

The reader can inspect those works and assess their existence, dates, content and development. Whether they constitute the fulfilment of a divine calling is a theological matter.

4.5 The wilderness, the hidden witness and the remnant

My understanding of being hidden in plain sight draws on biblical themes of wilderness, preparation, endurance and the remnant.

In the biblical narrative, wilderness is not always a place of abandonment. It can be a place of testing, preparation, dependence and transformation. The experience of being unseen or rejected by human authority does not necessarily mean that a person has been abandoned by God.

I understand my own circumstances through that framework. I believe that the periods in which I felt isolated, displaced or unprotected did not extinguish my purpose. I believe that the work of preserving the archive and continuing to write was part of that purpose.

This is a theological interpretation of my life, not a claim that a particular agency deliberately placed me in a wilderness as part of a supernatural plan. The report must not attribute divine causation to institutional conduct as though it were a fact established by the documents.

4.6 Forgiveness and accountability

My faith does not require me to deny the consequences of what I describe as betrayal.

I can speak of forgiveness without withdrawing my testimony. I can seek mercy without surrendering the right to document events. I can refuse retaliation while still identifying the people and institutions whose actions are recorded in the evidence.

The distinction between accountability and vengeance is fundamental to this report.

I do not need to hate a person to describe what that person did. I do not need to seek revenge to insist that a decision, omission or failure be examined. Nor should my anger, distress or forceful language be used as a substitute for engaging with the substance of my evidence.

4.7 Spiritual conclusion

My testimony is that God preserved me through grace, mercy and love. I believe that my survival has purpose and that my work of bearing witness is part of that purpose.

The documentary archive can establish the existence of my writings and preservation work. It can establish that I have publicly expressed these beliefs. It cannot independently prove the supernatural source of my survival or determine God's private intentions.

That distinction does not diminish the centrality of my faith. It defines the honest boundary between documentary examination and spiritual testimony.

I remain alive. I remain a witness. I believe that God has preserved me for a purpose.

SECTION 5 — GOVERNMENT AND INSTITUTIONAL TREATMENT

5.1 The institutional record must be examined as a whole

My experience with government and service institutions cannot be assessed by accepting each agency's account as a complete description of my life.

Each institution may hold only part of the record. One may hold an injury-related file; another, a public-interest disclosure; another, a police report; another, a financial administration record; another, an NDIS plan; and another, an accommodation or safety assessment.

The fact that each institution has a separate jurisdiction does not mean that the consequences experienced by the individual are separate.

I have had to navigate these systems as one person. The consequences of a decision in one system can affect the practical operation of another. Financial restrictions can affect transport. Transport can affect medical appointments. Accommodation can affect safety and the ability to care for Crystal. Support coordination can affect access to services. An unresolved complaint can affect the ability to obtain a coherent explanation of what happened.

This is why the institutional record must be read cumulatively.

5.2 Comcare and the injury-related record

The Official Government Documents Register identifies OGDR-007 as a Comcare document dated 26 May 2021 and OGDR-070 as an Administrative Appeals Tribunal matter concerning McLean and Comcare.

These entries are important because they identify an injury-related administrative history and a review-related record. They must be considered alongside the underlying injury material, claim documents, medical evidence, decisions, reasons, correspondence and any review outcome.

I have described my dealings with Comcare as part of a wider history in which I believe my injury and its consequences were inadequately recognised or represented. I have also used the term whitewashing to describe what I believe happened.

That is a serious characterisation. The report must not use it as a substitute for identifying the actual documentary discrepancy. It must examine whether the records show:

- an initial account of the injury;
- later descriptions of the injury;
- medical evidence considered by Comcare;

- evidence excluded or not addressed;
- changes in the description of the event;
- inconsistencies between records;
- reasons given for decisions;
- the material considered by the reviewer or tribunal;
- any correction or acknowledgment of error;
- the practical consequences of the decisions.

If the documents establish that a material item was omitted, the report must say so. If a later decision contradicts an earlier record, the contradiction must be stated. If the record establishes only that I disputed the decision, that must be stated accurately. If evidence of deliberate concealment is found, it must be identified specifically. If the evidence establishes an error but not intent, the conclusion must be administrative error or inconsistency rather than deliberate whitewashing.

I do not accept that the existence of an official decision automatically makes its underlying reasoning correct. The reasons must be tested against the evidence they purport to address.

5.3 Public-interest disclosures and the Ombudsman record

The archive identifies OGDR-030 as an Ombudsman public-interest disclosure matter in which a disclosure was not allocated.

The 2023 Federal Court-related PID assessment is also identified as a separate record: 2023 Federal Court PID Assessment.

The two records must not be collapsed into one event. Their dates, issuing bodies, statutory context and procedural outcomes must be separately identified.

The important analytical distinction is between the substance of a disclosure and the statutory or administrative decision about whether it can be allocated or dealt with through a particular process.

A decision not to allocate a disclosure may resolve a procedural question. It does not necessarily resolve whether the underlying conduct occurred. Where the reason concerns eligibility, jurisdiction, recipient status or another statutory requirement, the effect of that reason must be stated precisely.

I have treated the disclosure history as significant because it concerns my attempts to report conduct I believed required public accountability. The report must preserve what I reported and what the institutions did with it. It must not describe a non-allocation decision as a substantive exoneration of the people or agencies named in the disclosure.

Equally, the existence of a disclosure does not establish that the reported misconduct occurred. The content must be compared with independent records and any available findings.

5.4 Federal Court correspondence and the limits of procedural outcomes

The 27 March 2023 Federal Court-related PID assessment is particularly important because it has been described in the archive as referring to categories of conduct including maladministration, danger to health or safety, and conduct concerning the course of justice.

Those terms carry serious significance. They must be quoted and contextualised from the actual document. They must not be converted into a judicial finding that a named person committed an offence.

The distinction is not a technicality. A statutory assessment may consider whether a report falls within a category of disclosable conduct without deciding whether the conduct has been proved. A procedural decision may prevent an allocation without determining the truth of the underlying report.

My conclusion is that the existence of the assessment belongs in the institutional chronology and must be examined as part of the history of my public-interest disclosures. Its procedural result must not be used to erase the disclosure or to imply that the allegations were adjudicated and disproved.

5.5 Police and protection records

The archive identifies an AFP response dated 3 September 2021 and an NSW Police outcome dated 24 August 2024. It also identifies a document titled Police Matter Legal Documents dated 20 January 2026.

These records are relevant to my reports of safety concerns and alleged criminal conduct. They must be examined separately, with attention to the incident or issue each one addresses.

A police response can establish that a report or inquiry was received and what action was recorded. It may also establish that a particular investigation was closed, referred, declined or otherwise dealt with. It does not automatically establish the truth or falsity of every underlying allegation.

I have reported serious matters, including threats and alleged attempts to harm me. Those reports must not be reduced to the fact that a police process did or did not result in charges. The content of the complaint, any contemporaneous evidence, the investigative steps recorded, the reasons for the outcome and the scope of the inquiry all matter.
Nor should the absence of a charge be misrepresented as proof that an offence occurred. A responsible report must state the precise police outcome and then separately assess the evidence of the alleged conduct.

5.6 Guardianship and financial administration

The archive identifies OGDR-077 as NCAT guardianship reasons and a NSW Trustee and Guardian document dated 16 October 2024 concerning section 122.
The later archive also identifies NCAT guardianship evidence dated 20 January 2026 and a vehicle disposal decision dated 14 November 2025.
These records concern matters that can directly affect a person's autonomy, finances, possessions, mobility and ability to make ordinary decisions.
My testimony is that the practical operation of financial administration and related restrictions has contributed to loss of independence and dependence on others. That claim must be examined against the actual orders, statutory powers, authorisations, reasons, financial records, communication history and review processes.
A legal power to administer finances does not remove the obligation to act within the scope of that power. Nor does the existence of a guardianship or financial management arrangement mean that every decision made under it was appropriate. Each decision must be examined on its own terms, including whether the relevant authority was exercised lawfully, for the proper purpose and with appropriate regard to the person's circumstances.
The report must also distinguish between a decision made by NCAT, a decision made by NSW Trustee and Guardian, and a decision made by another service provider. These are not interchangeable institutions. Responsibility must be attributed to the body that actually made the decision.

5.7 NDIS planning and support delivery

The NDIS Plan Approval dated 20 November 2025 is an identified public record in the archive: NDIS Plan Approval — 20 November 2025.
The Anglicare Safety Assessment dated 1 December 2025 is another identified record: Anglicare Safety Assessment / Duty of Care — 1 December 2025.
The SIL/SDA accommodation request dated 20 January 2026 is also identified: Accommodation Request — SIL/SDA, 20 January 2026.
Together, these records identify a sequence involving plan approval, safety assessment and an accommodation request. They are important because they relate to the actual supports and living arrangements through which my daily needs were to be met.
The approval of a plan is not the same as the delivery of support. A safety assessment is not the same as the implementation of safeguards. A request for accommodation is not the same as the provision of suitable accommodation.
The practical test is what support was approved, what was actually delivered, what risks were identified, what actions followed, whether the accommodation was suitable, and whether the arrangements met the needs recorded in the relevant documents.
I have described problems with coordination, communication, accommodation and practical support. Those claims must be compared with rosters, service agreements, contact records, support notes, invoices, incident records, complaints and the actual terms of the plan.

5.8 Able Point and the current accommodation concerns

My account of Able Point is part of the current human and institutional significance of this report. I have described living in supported accommodation in New South Wales, paying $200 per week in rent, and not having a signed lease. I have raised concerns about the transparency of the accommodation arrangements, the management of support, the responsibilities of staff and the practical assistance available to me.
I have identified concerns involving food access, money, banking, transport, telephone access and assistance with appointments. I have also identified staff interactions that I experienced as dismissive or inadequate. I have since clarified that I currently have enough food and am taking my medication. The report must preserve that correction.
The central concern is not whether I can be described as unwell or vulnerable. The central concern is whether the accommodation and support arrangements are transparent, properly documented, safe and consistent with the obligations that apply to the provider and relevant decision-makers.

A person receiving disability support remains entitled to be treated as a person with agency, dignity and a voice. Their complaints should be examined on their substance. Their disability should not be used to avoid answering them.
I have named individual workers and people associated with the arrangements. Naming someone in my testimony does not prove that the person committed misconduct. The evidence must establish each person's role, what they knew, what they did, what they were responsible for and what consequences followed. The same standard applies to managers, coordinators, trustees, public officials and the organisations themselves.

5.9 The institutional record: conclusion

The records identified in the archive cover multiple institutional systems: Comcare, public-interest disclosure processes, the Ombudsman, police, guardianship, financial administration, the NDIS, safety assessment and accommodation.
This is a documented breadth of institutional involvement. It is not, by itself, proof that all institutions acted together or that a coordinated mandate existed.
But it is also not reasonable to examine each event in isolation and then declare that no cumulative pattern can exist simply because different agencies have different functions.
The cumulative question is whether the records reveal repeated transfers of responsibility, unanswered issues, inconsistent explanations, unresolved requests, practical dependence and consequences that compounded over time. Those mechanisms must be identified from the chronology and source documents. Where the record establishes them, they must be stated directly.
I reject any conclusion that treats the existence of an agency process as proof that the underlying human problem was resolved. The fact that a form was processed, a decision issued, a disclosure not allocated, a plan approved or a complaint closed does not, by itself, establish that the person received justice, protection, suitable support or an adequate explanation.
The administrative record is not the whole truth of my life. It is evidence of how institutions dealt with parts of it. The consequences of those dealings must be examined from the perspective of the person who had to live with them.
End of this instalment. The next instalment continues with Sections 6–9: the Comcare injury record and alleged whitewashing; public-interest disclosure, Federal Court and police protection processes; NDIS, disability services, finance, accommodation and Crystal; and FOI, OAIC, Legal Aid and access to justice.

THE WITNESS REMAINS — THE DIVINE CONTRAST

CONTINUATION: THE FORENSIC EXAMINATION

PRESERVATION FIRST. EXAMINATION SECOND. CONCLUSION LAST.
FAITH IS NOT A FINDING. TESTIMONY IS NOT ERASED BY THE ABSENCE OF AN OFFICIAL DETERMINATION.

SECTION 6 — COMCARE, INJURY AND THE ALLEGATION OF WHITEWASHING

6.1 Why the injury record matters

My injury history is not a peripheral part of this report. It is one of the foundations of the wider account of my dealings with government and the administrative systems that subsequently affected my life.
I have described an injury and its consequences, and I have disputed the way aspects of that history were recorded, interpreted or addressed. I have used the term whitewashing to describe what I believe happened to the record.
I do not use that word lightly. It conveys my belief that the documentary account did not adequately reflect the reality of what I experienced and that important matters were obscured, minimised or inadequately addressed.
The forensic task is to establish exactly what happened to the record.
A report that merely repeats the final position of an agency would be inadequate. A report that assumes every difference between two documents proves deliberate concealment would also be inadequate. The correct approach is to reconstruct the documentary history and identify the precise nature of every discrepancy.

6.2 The Comcare documentary trail

The master record identifies:

- OGDR-007: Comcare record dated 26 May 2021.
- OGDR-070: AAT matter concerning McLean and Comcare.

These are identified entries in the Official Government Documents Register. Their precise contents and legal significance must be established from the underlying records.
The relevant public archive is:
Official Government Documents Register
Main Barrandodger documentary repository
The records must be examined in the following sequence:
- The original report or notification of injury.
- The earliest available medical or clinical documentation.
- The initial Comcare claim material.
- Any requests for further information.
- Any statements, reports or assessments relied upon.
- The decision or administrative action dated 26 May 2021.
- Any subsequent review or appeal material.
- The AAT-related documents.
- Any later correspondence correcting, disputing or explaining the earlier account.

The purpose is to identify the actual documentary progression, not to assume that the last document is necessarily the most accurate.

6.3 The difference between an error, an omission and concealment

The term whitewashing can describe several different types of conduct. They must not be confused.
Administrative error occurs when information is recorded inaccurately or a decision is made on a mistaken understanding.
Omission occurs when relevant information is not included or addressed. An omission may be accidental, negligent or deliberate.
Mischaracterisation occurs when information is described in a way that changes its meaning or significance.
Selective reliance occurs when a decision-maker relies on some available material while failing to address other relevant material.
Concealment involves deliberately hiding, suppressing or withholding information that should not properly have been concealed.
Falsification involves deliberately making or altering a record so that it misrepresents what occurred.
These distinctions matter because they identify different levels of responsibility.
If the Comcare record contains an inaccurate description, that inaccuracy must be identified. If an important medical record was not considered, that omission must be documented. If a later decision relies on an earlier inaccurate description, the chain of reliance must be reconstructed. If evidence demonstrates that an individual knowingly altered or concealed information, the report can then examine the possibility of deliberate misconduct.
I will not allow the term whitewashing to be dismissed merely because an agency has not admitted to it. Equally, the report must identify the evidence that supports the specific meaning of the term in each instance.

6.4 The importance of chronology

A document's date can be as important as its wording.
An account written close to an event may have a different evidentiary significance from an account produced years later. A later document may contain corrections, additional information or a different interpretation. A record created after a dispute has emerged may reflect the institution's subsequent understanding rather than the original event.
For that reason, the injury record must be assessed chronologically.
The relevant questions are:
- What was recorded first?
- Who created the original record?
- What information did that person have?
- What did the record say about the injury?
- What was added or removed later?
- Were corrections explained?
- Did later decision-makers rely on the earlier account?
- Was contradictory material acknowledged?
- Were my objections recorded accurately?
- Did the final administrative position address the substance of those objections?

The answer to these questions cannot be supplied by the existence of a later decision alone.

6.5 The AAT record and administrative review

The AAT-related entry, OGDR-070, is significant because review proceedings can reveal which issues were contested, which evidence was considered and which matters were determined.
The report must distinguish:

- the original administrative decision;
- the grounds of review;
- the evidence submitted by each party;
- any concessions or agreed facts;
- the tribunal's findings;
- the orders or final outcome;
- any issues that were outside the tribunal's jurisdiction or were not determined.

A tribunal decision does not automatically determine every historical or criminal allegation connected with the broader story. Its conclusions must be limited to the issues actually before it. Nor should the fact that a matter proceeded through a review mechanism be presented as proof that the original decision was correct. Review is necessary precisely because administrative decisions can be disputed and may require reconsideration.

6.6 The consequences of an inaccurate injury record

The consequences of an injury record extend beyond the document itself.
An inaccurate or incomplete record can influence later assessments, eligibility decisions, support arrangements, financial circumstances and the way other institutions understand a person's history.
If one institution relies on another institution's description without examining the underlying evidence, an original error can be repeated. The later record may appear independent while actually reproducing the same uncorrected information.
This is an important potential mechanism in my wider account.
It does not prove that such a mechanism operated in every institution involved in my circumstances. It does identify why the original records and the later records must be compared rather than treated as separate, self-validating documents.

6.7 Finding on the Comcare issue

On the material presently identified, the report can establish that the archive contains a Comcare-related record dated 26 May 2021 and an AAT-related entry concerning McLean and Comcare.
The full underlying documents have not been inspected in this examination. Consequently, I cannot responsibly state that a particular medical fact was deliberately removed, that a named official falsified a record, or that a criminal offence was committed by a particular person.
My allegation of whitewashing remains part of my testimony and must be examined against the original and subsequent records.
My position is that the injury record must be judged by the evidence it contains, the evidence it omits, the changes made over time and the consequences of those changes. An institutional description cannot be accepted as the truth simply because it is the institutional description.

SECTION 7 — PUBLIC-INTEREST DISCLOSURES, FEDERAL COURT CORRESPONDENCE, POLICE AND PROTECTION RECORDS

7.1 The significance of making a disclosure

I have described myself as a whistleblower and have preserved records concerning disclosures and complaints made to public institutions.
The significance of whistleblowing is not limited to whether a disclosure ultimately receives statutory protection. It also concerns the nature of the information reported, the recipient, the response, the reasons for any refusal or non-allocation, and the practical consequences for the person who made the report.
A person can report conduct they genuinely believe to be serious and still encounter a statutory eligibility problem. A disclosure can raise matters that appear to concern maladministration or danger to health and safety without the receiving body ultimately determining that those matters occurred.
Those distinctions must be preserved.
I do not accept that a procedural barrier should be retrospectively represented as proof that my report was false. But I also do not claim that the existence of a disclosure automatically establishes the underlying misconduct.

7.2 OGDR-030 — Ombudsman public-interest disclosure not allocated

The master record identifies OGDR-030 as an Ombudsman PID matter in which the disclosure was not allocated.

The significance of this record is that it identifies an institutional process concerning a disclosure and a recorded procedural outcome.
The actual reasons must be quoted from the original document. The report must determine whether the non-allocation related to:
- statutory eligibility;
- the identity or status of the discloser;
- the identity or status of the recipient;
- jurisdiction;
- the definition of disclosable conduct;
- the nature of the information supplied;
- a procedural requirement;
- another stated reason.

It is important not to assume which of these reasons applied without reading the decision.
A decision not to allocate is not automatically a finding that the reported events did not occur. It is also not a finding that they did occur.
The correct conclusion is limited to the procedural action actually recorded.

7.3 The Federal Court correspondence of 27 March 2023

The archive identifies:
2023-03-27 Federal Court PID Assessment.
The prior account of this document associates it with correspondence from Scott Tredwell and the assessment of reported conduct using categories including:
- maladministration;
- danger to health or safety;
- conduct concerning the course of justice.

The prior account also describes a procedural issue concerning the allocation of the disclosure under the Public Interest Disclosure framework.
This document is important because it belongs to the formal documentary history of my attempts to raise concerns through a public-interest disclosure process.
But I must be precise about what it establishes.
It is not a conviction. It is not a criminal judgment. It is not proof that every allegation in the disclosure occurred. It must not be presented as a court finding that a person committed perverting the course of justice.
Its importance is that it records a disclosure-related assessment and the statutory or procedural issues considered in that assessment.
The fact that an institution considered whether reported conduct fell within categories of disclosable conduct is not the same as a finding that the conduct occurred. Equally, a decision not to allocate a disclosure is not the same as a substantive determination that the reported conduct was false.

7.4 The Commonwealth Ombudsman complaint of 15 November 2021

The archive identifies:
Commonwealth Ombudsman Complaint 2021103546 — 15 November 2021.
This is an important contemporaneous record in the chronology.
A complaint document can establish that I raised particular concerns at a particular time. It can establish the issues I presented to the institution and the action or response recorded in the correspondence.
It does not automatically prove the underlying events. But it is evidence of notice: the institution was informed of the matters set out in the complaint.
Where a later institution claims that it was unaware of an issue, the date and content of an earlier complaint can become important. Where a later decision fails to address a matter previously raised, the comparison may reveal an omission or an unresolved issue.
The complaint must therefore be read alongside the response, not merely listed as another piece of correspondence.

7.5 The APRA and OAIC correspondence

The archive identifies a 2021 OAIC privacy record, CP2102752, and other correspondence concerning access, privacy and regulatory processes.
It also identifies:
2022-07-14 OPMC/OAIC correspondence record.
The filename contains my own characterisation of the matter. The title must not be treated as an independent finding of a cover-up. The document must be assessed by its actual contents, authorship, date, correspondence history and the matters it addresses.

The same principle applies to all documents in the archive: a filename may communicate the author's interpretation, but it does not replace the evidence contained in the document.
The OAIC and APRA records are relevant to the broader question of access to information, privacy and the handling of reports. Their precise significance depends on the actual correspondence and the applicable statutory framework.

7.6 AFP response dated 3 September 2021

The master record identifies an AFP response dated 3 September 2021.
That response belongs in the police and protection chronology. Its exact scope must be taken from the document.
The report must distinguish between:

- a report made to the AFP;
- the AFP's acknowledgment or response;
- any referral to another body;
- any jurisdictional explanation;
- any decision to investigate or not investigate;
- any conclusion recorded about the particular matter.

A response from a police agency does not automatically establish that an allegation is true or false. The report must not infer more than the document says.

7.7 NSW Police outcome dated 24 August 2024

The master record also identifies an NSW Police outcome dated 24 August 2024.
This is a separate event from the AFP response. It must be examined in its own context.
The exact incident, report number, allegations, persons involved, action taken and stated outcome must be established from the original document. It would be inaccurate to describe an outcome as an exoneration, a finding of fabrication or proof of criminal conduct unless the document actually supports that description.
My testimony about the event and the police record of its handling are different evidentiary sources. They must be compared, not substituted for each other.

7.8 Protection and the alleged targeting

I have described myself as a person who sought protection and who experienced circumstances that I understood as targeting, intimidation and political displacement.
I have also preserved records and requests concerning protection, police matters and security-related information.
The archive identifies an IGIS/ASIO request for information dated 20 January 2026:
IGIS/ASIO Request for Information — 20 January 2026.
The existence of a request for information does not prove that ASIO or another security agency was involved in any alleged conduct. It establishes that I made or preserved a request directed to the relevant oversight or security-related channel.
That distinction is particularly important because allegations of surveillance, targeting or security-agency involvement are serious. They require specific evidence identifying the conduct, source, date, mechanism and connection to the alleged actor.
I have reported experiences that I understood as electronic harassment and interference. I have described them in terms including V2K and interference involving Wi-Fi or television equipment. These experiences are part of my testimony. The archive's existence does not establish the technical source or cause of those experiences. A forensic conclusion about electronic interference would require technical evidence such as device examinations, network logs, signal analysis, verified recordings and a reliable chain of custody.
The report must not ridicule or erase the experience. It must also not state that a government agency carried it out without evidence establishing that attribution.

7.9 Finding on the disclosure and protection record

The identified material establishes a sustained history of complaints, disclosure-related processes and communications with government bodies, including the Ombudsman, AFP and other agencies.
The 2023 Federal Court-related assessment is a significant identified record in that history. Its procedural outcome must be distinguished from a determination of the truth of the underlying allegations.
The police records must be read in their own terms. The security-related request must not be transformed into proof of security-agency involvement.
My conclusion is that the disclosure and protection history is a substantive part of the documentary record and cannot fairly be erased simply because every complaint did not produce a prosecution, formal investigation or finding in my favour.

The fact that I reported something, the fact that an institution received it, the fact that it was assessed, and the fact that the underlying event occurred are separate propositions. A proper examination must preserve all four distinctions.

SECTION 8 — NDIS, DISABILITY SERVICES, FINANCE, ACCOMMODATION AND CRYSTAL

8.1 The difference between funding approval and actual support

The NDIS is central to the practical circumstances described in this report.

A plan can be approved without every required support being delivered. A service can be funded without the participant receiving the intended benefit. A support coordinator can be appointed without effective communication. An accommodation arrangement can exist without meeting the person's needs for safety, dignity, independence and choice.

The distinction between funding and delivery is fundamental.

I have identified the NDIS Plan Approval dated 20 November 2025:

NDIS Plan Approval 366406 — 20 November 2025.

The report must examine the actual plan, including:

- the plan period;
- funded support categories;
- stated goals;
- support needs recorded;
- funding amounts;
- conditions and restrictions;
- review arrangements;
- any stated reasons for decisions;
- the relationship between the plan and the support actually delivered.

Without those details, it would be inappropriate to state the precise level of funding or claim that a particular support was approved or refused.

But the existence of the plan is a starting point for a more important practical examination: what did the plan mean in my daily life?

8.2 Service delivery and the evidence required to assess it

The delivery of support must be examined through records that show what actually happened.

The relevant evidence includes:

- service agreements;
- participant consent records;
- support rosters;
- shift notes;
- case notes;
- invoices;
- claims against NDIS funding;
- transport records;
- incident reports;
- risk assessments;
- communication with support coordinators;
- complaints and responses;
- records of cancelled or missed shifts;
- records of support that was delivered by a different person or organisation;
- any records explaining why a particular support was not provided.

These documents are important because they distinguish a promised service from a delivered service.

If an invoice records support that was not delivered, that is a serious matter requiring examination. If a roster records a worker but no shift note exists, that may identify a gap in the records, although it does not automatically prove the shift did not occur. If an incident report was required but not completed, the relevant duty and circumstances must be established before reaching a conclusion.

The report must not assume fraud from an unexplained discrepancy. But it must not dismiss a discrepancy merely because the provider has submitted an invoice or recorded the service as complete.

8.3 The two ABNs

The master command identifies two ABNs:

- 31 650 183 681
- 55 668 333 033

These identifiers must be treated separately.

An ABN identifies a registered business or entity. It does not, by itself, prove the full legal relationship between two businesses, the identity of their directors or operators, or the responsibility for a particular service.
The relevant questions are:
- Which entity held each ABN?
- During what dates was each ABN active?
- Which entity entered into the service agreement?
- Which entity invoiced for the support?
- Which entity received payment?
- Which entity employed or engaged the support workers?
- Which entity held the relevant provider registration, if applicable?
- Which entity was responsible for complaints and incident management?
- Were services transferred between entities?
- Were the participant or their representative properly informed of any change?

The report must not merge these entities without evidence. Nor should it assume that the use of different business identifiers is improper. The answer must come from the registration, contract, invoice and service records.

8.4 Financial administration and the ability to exercise choice

My financial circumstances are a central part of my account of reduced independence.
The 23 October 2026 legal brief records the following reported fortnightly figures:

Item	Amount
Income	$1,371.27
Listed expenses	$1,369.96
Arithmetic remainder	$1.31

The arithmetic shows a very narrow margin between the recorded income and listed expenses. These figures are those stated in the brief, not an independently audited financial statement.
The significance is practical.
A person with almost no discretionary margin may be unable to absorb an unexpected transport cost, replacement phone, medical expense, pet expense or delay in receiving access to funds. A small interruption can have consequences disproportionate to its dollar value.
I have reported that access to my CommBank internet banking and app was restricted following the involvement of financial administration arrangements. I have described difficulties obtaining a clear response and seeking assistance through branch visits and complaints.
Those are matters of personal testimony that require comparison with bank correspondence, account access records, trustee authorisations, complaint records and transaction history.
The report must distinguish between:
- the existence of a financial management arrangement;
- the powers conferred by the relevant order;
- any direction given to the bank;
- the bank's own security or access decisions;
- the practical ability I retained to access my funds;
- any requests I made for access;
- the responses received;
- the consequences for ordinary daily activities.

It would be wrong to assume that every bank restriction was caused by the Trustee or Guardian without evidence. It would also be wrong to assume that a restriction was appropriate merely because the bank or administrator applied it.

8.5 Vehicle disposal and independence

The archive identifies:
NSW Trustee and Guardian Vehicle Disposal Decision — 14 November 2025.
This document is important because I have described my vehicle as central to my independence and mobility.
I have also described a period of living in a vehicle with Crystal and said that, in important respects, I experienced that arrangement as happier and more independent than the arrangements that followed.
That is a statement about my lived experience. It does not mean that living in a vehicle is necessarily safe or suitable accommodation for every person. It means that, in my circumstances, the vehicle represented mobility, control over where I went, the ability to travel with Crystal and a degree of independence that I believe I subsequently lost.

The disposal decision must therefore be assessed not only as a financial transaction but also in terms of its effect on my practical autonomy.
The relevant questions are:
- What was the vehicle's value?
- What was the stated reason for disposal?
- Who made the decision?
- What authority was relied upon?
- Was I consulted?
- What information was provided to me?
- Was my objection recorded?
- Was the impact on my mobility considered?
- Was the effect on Crystal considered?
- What happened to the proceeds?
- What alternative transport arrangements were available?
- Was there a review mechanism?

If the decision was lawful, the reasons and supporting records should establish that. If it was made without proper consideration of relevant circumstances, the evidence should show that. The report must not presume the answer before examining the decision.

8.6 Able Point: accommodation is more than a bed

I have described my current accommodation arrangements at Able Point as a major source of concern.
The central issue is the difference between being placed in accommodation and being provided with a life that preserves dignity, choice, safety and independence.
A bed is not a substitute for a transparent occupancy agreement. A support roster is not a substitute for meaningful assistance. A service plan is not a substitute for support that is actually delivered. A provider's description of an arrangement does not automatically establish that the arrangement is acceptable to the person living under it.
I have reported that I do not have a signed lease and that I pay $200 per week. The legal and practical status of the occupancy arrangement must be assessed against the actual documents, payment records, applicable law and communications.
The report should distinguish:
- a residential tenancy agreement;
- a licence or occupancy arrangement;
- supported accommodation;
- a service agreement;
- an NDIS-funded support arrangement;
- any agreement made with a trustee, guardian or representative.

These documents can operate together, but they are not interchangeable. A service agreement does not automatically establish the legal right to occupy a property. A payment record does not necessarily establish all the terms of the occupancy. A provider's description of a residence as supported accommodation does not settle the legal status of the arrangement.
My complaint is that I have experienced the arrangement as controlling and as limiting my independence. That experience must be preserved as testimony and assessed against the actual agreements, decisions and communications.

8.7 Staff conduct and the responsibility of management

I have identified several staff members and people associated with my accommodation and support arrangements.
The report must examine conduct at the level of the actual event. It must not turn a person's name into an accusation.
For each relevant interaction, the evidence should establish:
- the date and location;
- who was present;
- what assistance I requested;
- what response was given;
- whether the request fell within that person's role;
- whether the person had authority to act;
- whether the matter was referred to a manager;
- whether any follow-up occurred;

• whether the interaction was documented;
• whether there was a complaint;
• whether the complaint was answered.

I have described an incident in which I requested assistance and a staff member left. I have also described concerns about access to practical help, money, food, telephone access and transport. Those matters should not be dismissed as trivial. For a person living in supported accommodation, assistance with ordinary tasks can be directly connected to safety, access to health services, communication and independence.

The current report does not have the underlying shift notes, incident reports or complete management correspondence available for inspection. It therefore records my account as testimony and identifies the documents that would determine the precise responsibility of each person.

8.8 Support coordination and Sukhi Tear

I have identified Suki/Sukhi Tear as a support coordinator associated with my arrangements and have reported that I understood the coordinator to be based in Perth and that I had not personally met her.

I have raised concerns about communication, continuity and the ability to account for periods of support and coordination.

Those concerns must be examined through the actual records:

• the support coordination agreement;
• the coordinator's appointment date;
• the service scope;
• contact logs;
• case notes;
• emails and text messages;
• referrals;
• records of decisions made;
• communications with providers;
• any handover or change of coordinator;
• the date and content of any cease-and-desist communication.

The fact that a coordinator is located remotely does not, by itself, establish inadequate service. The relevant question is whether the coordination was delivered effectively, whether the coordinator maintained appropriate communication, and whether the participant's needs were addressed.

If there are periods for which the records cannot account, that is a documentary gap. Its significance depends on what the coordinator was responsible for during that period and whether the absence of records affected the delivery of support.

8.9 Crystal and the practical meaning of accommodation

Crystal is part of my life and my responsibility.

The welfare of an assistance animal or companion animal can affect a person's accommodation choices, emotional stability, mobility and practical daily routine. My relationship with Crystal is part of the circumstances that any realistic assessment of my accommodation must consider.

I have described my life with Crystal in the vehicle as, in important respects, more independent than my subsequent arrangements. That statement should be understood in context: I am describing my own experience, not making a general recommendation that people should live in vehicles.

The relevant question is whether my accommodation and support arrangements take account of the actual life I live, including my relationship with Crystal, rather than treating me as an abstract participant whose needs can be reduced to a bed, a roster or a funding category.

8.10 The phrase "blood money"

I have used the phrase blood money to express moral outrage about funding and support arrangements that I believe have failed to protect my dignity and independence.

That expression must be understood as moral and rhetorical language. It is not a financial classification, a statutory category or proof that a particular provider committed fraud.

The substantive issue underneath the expression is whether public or participant funding was used in accordance with the relevant plans, agreements, service obligations and records of actual delivery.

If there is evidence of improper claiming, misrepresentation, financial exploitation or misuse of funds, it must be identified and assessed specifically. The phrase itself does not prove those offences.

8.11 Finding on NDIS, finance and accommodation

The identified archive records establish that NDIS planning, safety assessment, vehicle disposal and SIL/SDA accommodation requests form part of my documented history.

My testimony describes significant concerns about independence, financial access, accommodation, support coordination, staff conduct and Crystal's welfare.

The evidence currently available in this examination does not establish every alleged breach by Able Point, an individual worker, a coordinator, the Trustee or another service provider. It also does not justify dismissing my concerns.

The central finding is that the practical arrangements governing my life must be assessed through their actual operation, not merely their administrative labels.

A funded service is not necessarily a delivered service. A decision made under a legal power is not automatically a just decision. An accommodation placement is not automatically a suitable home.

SECTION 9 — LEGAL AID, FOI, OAIC AND ACCESS TO JUSTICE

9.1 Access to justice is more than the existence of a complaint pathway

My dealings with FOI, the OAIC, the Ombudsman, Legal Aid and other review bodies form part of the wider history of my attempts to obtain information, challenge decisions and have my concerns addressed.

The existence of a complaints process does not automatically mean that a person has meaningful access to justice.

Access requires more than a website, an application form or a published procedure. It requires a practical ability to understand the process, submit the relevant material, obtain a reasoned response, correct errors, access records and pursue available review rights.

For a person with disability and limited financial resources, the practical burden of repeated applications, correspondence, delays and procedural requirements can be substantial.

The report must examine what happened in each process, including the actual decision, the reasons given and the consequences.

9.2 FOI/2022/045 and the Department of the Prime Minister and Cabinet

The master record identifies FOI/2022/045 and a refusal dated 14 April 2022 by the Department of the Prime Minister and Cabinet.

This is an important part of the information-access chronology.

The relevant evidence must establish:

- what documents I requested;
- the date of the request;
- the statutory basis of the request;
- the agency's searches;
- any exemptions relied upon;
- the reasons for refusal;
- any consultation undertaken;
- whether a schedule of documents was provided;
- whether internal review or external review was sought;
- the outcome of any review;
- what documents were eventually released.

The refusal itself does not prove that the agency was concealing wrongdoing. A lawful FOI exemption may apply in particular circumstances. But an exemption must be assessed against its statutory basis and the actual content of the documents.

The agency's assertion that an exemption applies is not the end of the analysis. The reason must be examined, and any review outcome must be considered.

9.3 OAIC extension involving 1,187 Outlook items

The master record identifies an OAIC extension involving 1,187 Outlook items.

This number is significant because it suggests a substantial volume of material was involved in the relevant processing exercise. It must not be represented as 1,187 separate findings, 1,187 separate complaints or 1,187 documents proving misconduct.

The exact record must establish:

- what the 1,187 items represented;
- whether they were emails, attachments or mixed records;
- which agency or system held them;
- why an extension was requested or granted;
- the date of the extension;
- the statutory provision relied upon;

• the expected processing time;
• whether the scope of the request changed;
• what was ultimately located and released.

The importance of the figure is the administrative scale of the information-handling task, not an assumption about the contents of every item.

9.4 Revised FOI decision dated 8 October 2024

The master record identifies a revised FOI decision dated 8 October 2024 concerning five documents.

That record must be examined alongside the original decision and any review correspondence.

The critical questions are:

• What changed between the original and revised decisions?
• Why were five documents treated differently?
• Were any exemptions removed or modified?
• Were documents newly identified?
• Were additional searches undertaken?
• Were the documents released in full or in part?
• Did the revised decision correct an earlier error?
• Did the revised decision resolve the original request?

A revised decision can demonstrate that the original administrative position changed. The reason for the change matters. It may reflect a correction, new information, reconsideration or a change in the scope of the request.

The report must not describe every revised decision as proof of wrongdoing. But neither should a revision be ignored when assessing the history of access to information.

9.5 Victorian Ombudsman FOI decision dated 14 June 2022

The archive identifies:

2022-06-14 Victorian Ombudsman FOI s29A decision.

The filename identifies the decision as concerning section 29A. The exact reasoning must be taken from the document.

The relevant assessment must establish the request, the exemption or provision relied upon, the public-interest considerations if applicable, and any review rights or subsequent decisions.

The existence of the record establishes that FOI access was part of my dealings with the Victorian Ombudsman. It does not independently establish that the refusal was unlawful or that the agency acted with improper motive.

9.6 Legal Aid and the practical ability to obtain representation

I have identified Legal Aid and access to legal assistance as part of the wider history of my attempts to obtain support and pursue accountability.

The report must distinguish between:

• an application for legal assistance;
• a decision about financial means;
• a decision about legal merits;
• a decision about the type of matter covered;
• a referral to another service;
• a refusal of assistance;
• a review or appeal of that refusal;
• the practical consequences of not having representation.

A refusal of legal assistance does not prove that a case lacks truth or importance. It may reflect statutory eligibility, available resources, merits tests, funding guidelines or jurisdictional limits.

But the consequences for a person seeking to challenge multiple administrative decisions can be significant. The inability to obtain representation may make it harder to understand complex statutory processes, obtain evidence, meet deadlines and pursue review rights.

The report must not claim that Legal Aid acted improperly unless the relevant decisions and applicable requirements establish that conclusion. It must also not treat the absence of representation as evidence that the underlying claims were unfounded.

9.7 The cumulative burden of repeated applications

The access-to-justice issue becomes more significant when considered across multiple institutions.

A person may be required to:

• make an initial complaint;
• submit a separate FOI request;
• seek internal review;

• apply to an oversight body;
• provide additional information;
• pursue a different statutory process;
• obtain a legal explanation;
• seek access to another institution's records;
• repeat the history to a new decision-maker.

Each step may have a legitimate procedural purpose. But the cumulative effect can be exhausting and can create practical barriers, especially where the person is also managing disability, accommodation, finances and daily support needs.

I have described that cumulative burden as part of my experience of institutional abandonment and displacement.

The report can examine the number and sequence of recorded applications, the time taken, the decisions made and the repeated requests for information. It must not assume that every delay was intentional or that every refusal was unlawful. But it can identify a pattern of administrative burden if the chronology establishes it.

9.8 The difference between an institution's jurisdiction and the underlying truth

One of the most important distinctions in this report is that an institution may decline to deal with an issue because it considers the matter outside its jurisdiction.

That decision may be legally correct. It may also leave the underlying problem unresolved.

A jurisdictional refusal answers a question about the institution's authority. It does not necessarily answer the question of what happened.

Similarly:

• a complaint may be closed without a finding on the underlying event;
• an FOI request may be refused without determining the truth of the material sought;
• a disclosure may not be allocated without a substantive investigation;
• Legal Aid may decline assistance without determining the factual merits of every allegation;
• a police report may receive no further action without a judicial finding.

These outcomes must be described precisely.

I do not accept that a series of procedural outcomes can fairly be presented as though each one independently disproved the underlying events. That would confuse jurisdiction, eligibility, process and factual truth.

9.9 Finding on access to justice

The master record identifies multiple FOI, OAIC, Ombudsman and public-interest disclosure processes, including the 2022 PM&C refusal, the OAIC extension involving 1,187 Outlook items and the revised decision of 8 October 2024 concerning five documents.

These records belong in the wider examination of access to information and administrative accountability.

The material presently identified does not establish that every refusal or delay was unlawful, nor does it establish a deliberate coordinated effort to prevent me from obtaining justice.

It does establish that information access and procedural pathways form a significant part of my documented history.

My conclusion is that a procedural outcome must not be misrepresented as a determination of the underlying facts. Where a body declines jurisdiction, refuses access, does not allocate a disclosure or declines legal assistance, the report must state exactly what was decided and what remained unresolved.

INTERIM SYNTHESIS — SECTIONS 6–9

The four sections examined here concern different but interconnected aspects of my life.

The Comcare and AAT records concern the injury-related administrative history.

The public-interest disclosure and police records concern my attempts to report serious matters and obtain an institutional response.

The NDIS, financial administration and accommodation records concern the practical conditions under which I live, receive support, exercise independence and care for Crystal.

The FOI, OAIC and Legal Aid records concern my ability to obtain information, understand decisions and pursue accountability.

These are not interchangeable processes. They must not be collapsed into one allegation. But they must also not be isolated from one another.

The cumulative pattern I have described is that I have had to navigate multiple institutions, each holding a different part of my history, while continuing to preserve the documents and explain the consequences of decisions affecting my life.

The evidence presently identified supports the existence of a substantial and sustained administrative history. It supports the conclusion that my dealings with government and disability-support systems have involved repeated formal processes, records and requests. It also supports the conclusion that the public archive contains identifiable material relating to those processes.
It does not, without further inspection of the underlying records, establish every allegation of deliberate concealment, criminal conduct, coordinated targeting or malicious intent.
That evidentiary boundary must not be turned into a declaration that no wrongdoing occurred.
I have a right to describe what I experienced. I have a right to preserve the documents. I have a right to question the decisions made about my life. And the institutions whose conduct is documented do not acquire immunity from examination merely because they hold public authority.

NEXT SECTIONS IN THE MASTER REPORT

The next instalment will proceed with:

- SECTION 10 — Political Exile, Displacement and the Search for Protection
- SECTION 11 — Crimes and Wrongs I Have Alleged Against Me
- SECTION 12 — The Alleged Attempted Assassination: Dedicated Examination
- SECTION 13 — Examination of Alleged Wrongdoing by Me
- SECTION 14 — Malice, Knowledge, Recklessness and Intentional Cruelty

These sections will preserve the distinction between my testimony, contemporaneous reporting, corroborating evidence, formal police or court findings, and unresolved allegations, while addressing the full seriousness of the claims rather than reducing them to administrative terminology.

THE WITNESS REMAINS — THE DIVINE CONTRAST

CONTINUATION: POLITICAL EXILE, CRIMINAL ALLEGATIONS AND THE QUESTION OF RESPONSIBILITY

PRESERVATION FIRST. EXAMINATION SECOND. CONCLUSION LAST.
FAITH IS NOT A FINDING. TESTIMONY IS NOT ERASED BY THE ABSENCE OF AN OFFICIAL DETERMINATION.

SECTION 10 — POLITICAL EXILE, DISPLACEMENT AND THE SEARCH FOR PROTECTION

10.1 The meaning of political exile in my testimony

I have described myself as living in political exile within the democracy of my own citizenship.
I want that expression understood accurately.
I am not asserting that an Australian citizenship instrument was formally cancelled, that I was legally deported, or that a government issued a formal instrument declaring me exiled. I am describing an experience of displacement and exclusion within the country of my citizenship: the experience of being unable to secure the protection, independence, stability and institutional accountability that I believe should have been available to me.
The expression political exile describes the contradiction at the heart of my testimony.
I am a citizen of the country whose institutions I have repeatedly approached for assistance, protection, information and accountability. Yet I have described experiencing circumstances in which I felt unprotected, displaced, dependent and unable to obtain a coherent response to matters I considered serious.
My use of the expression is therefore a statement about lived political and human-rights experience, not a claim that a formal legal status has been conferred upon me.

10.2 Citizenship and the promise of protection

Citizenship carries practical and moral expectations. It implies that a person belongs to a political community and is entitled to the protections and responsibilities established by its laws.
My testimony is that I repeatedly sought those protections and experienced the resulting institutional processes as fragmented and inadequate.
The records identified in the earlier sections establish a history of complaints, public-interest disclosure processes, police correspondence, FOI applications, guardianship and financial administration, disability support and accommodation requests.
Those processes are relevant to my claim of political exile because they show the institutional context in which I experienced displacement.
However, the mere existence of multiple government processes does not establish that the Australian Government deliberately exiled me. The stronger and more defensible conclusion is that I have described a lived experience of political exclusion and lack of effective protection, which must be examined against the actual decisions, outcomes and consequences recorded in the documents.

10.3 The protection reference and the asylum dimension

I have referred to a UNHCR/asylum-related reference:
UR/UST/23/AUS/17.

This reference forms part of my personal account of seeking protection and should be preserved exactly as I have provided it.

Its legal or administrative significance must be established from the actual document or correspondence associated with it. The reference alone does not establish that UNHCR granted refugee status, that an asylum application was formally accepted, or that an international protection determination was made.

Those are separate matters requiring the relevant UNHCR or government record.

I do not want the reference omitted simply because its formal status has not been independently established in this examination. It is part of my stated protection history and must be recorded as such.

10.4 Displacement from Victoria to New South Wales

My relocation from Victoria to New South Wales is part of the chronology of my changed circumstances.

I have described the move in the context of my wider experience of institutional conflict, protection concerns, disability support, guardianship and accommodation.

The move itself can be established through dated correspondence, address records, service transfers, accommodation documents, travel records and government communications.

The reason for the move requires separate evidence.

A relocation may be an ordinary change of residence, a response to accommodation circumstances, a consequence of support arrangements, an attempt to obtain safety, or a combination of factors. The report must not infer the existence of a coordinated government operation merely from the fact that I moved interstate.

But neither should the significance of the move be reduced to an administrative change of address if it formed part of my reported experience of displacement.

10.5 The AVO and related circumstances

I have referred to an apprehended violence order (AVO) and to circumstances involving relocation, police and political figures.

An AVO is a legal instrument with a particular scope, parties, conditions and procedural history. Its existence does not automatically establish that every allegation underlying an application was true. Nor does the existence of an application establish that an order was ultimately made.

The relevant evidence must establish:

- who applied;
- against whom the application was made;
- the date of application;
- the court or police process involved;
- whether an interim order was made;
- whether a final order was made;
- the actual conditions;
- the duration;
- any variation or revocation;
- the reasons recorded by the court, if any;
- any relationship to the events described in my testimony.

I have referred to political figures, including Bill Shorten, in my broader account. The report must not attribute responsibility for a criminal act, direction, conspiracy or protection failure to any named political figure without evidence connecting that person to the conduct.

A person's public office does not make them immune from examination. But public prominence does not make an allegation true.

10.6 The distinction between displacement and formal exile

There are several different propositions that must be kept separate:

Proposition	Evidentiary status
I am an Australian citizen.	To be supported by citizenship documentation where formally required.
I have described myself as politically exiled within my own citizenship.	Personal testimony and political characterisation.

I relocated from Victoria to New South Wales.	A factual event capable of documentary verification.
I sought protection and referred to UR/UST/23/AUS/17.	Personal testimony and an identified reference requiring source verification.
I was formally recognised as a refugee or granted asylum.	Not established by the material inspected here.
Government deliberately exiled me through a coordinated operation.	A serious allegation requiring specific evidence of decision, authority, intention and action.

This distinction protects the integrity of my testimony. It prevents my language from being misrepresented as a formal legal claim while preserving the actual human experience I am describing.

10.7 Human-rights significance

The human-rights significance of my account is not dependent on proving a formal legal category of exile.

A person can experience profound displacement, dependence, loss of autonomy and lack of effective protection without being formally deported or stripped of citizenship.

The relevant human-rights questions include:

- whether I was treated with dignity;
- whether I could exercise meaningful choice;
- whether I had access to suitable accommodation;
- whether I could obtain and use my own resources;
- whether my complaints were considered fairly;
- whether I could access information;
- whether I could seek protection without being dismissed;
- whether disability-related needs were adequately considered;
- whether my relationship with Crystal was taken into account;
- whether I had a meaningful opportunity to challenge decisions affecting me.

These are practical questions about the treatment of a person, not merely abstract questions about the terminology used to describe that treatment.

10.8 Finding on political exile and protection

My description of political exile is a statement of lived experience and political interpretation. It must not be converted into a claim of formal legal exile without a corresponding instrument.

The archive identifies records concerning police matters, guardianship, accommodation, disability support and requests for protection-related information. Those records form part of the context in which I describe displacement and lack of protection.

The material presently inspected does not establish a formal refugee determination or a government order of exile. It also does not disprove my account of feeling displaced, unprotected or excluded.

My testimony is that I have experienced political exile within the democracy of my own citizenship. I am asking the reader to examine the documented circumstances that gave rise to that description, not to pretend that a formal legal label is the only way a human being can experience exile.

SECTION 11 — CRIMES AND WRONGS I HAVE ALLEGED AGAINST ME

11.1 Why the allegations must be examined directly

I have reported serious conduct that I believe was directed against me.

Those reports include alleged assault, threats, intimidation, stalking, harassment, coercion, deception, fraud, theft, financial exploitation, identity misuse, surveillance, restraint, extortion, property damage, computer-related offences, evidence interference, perverting the course of justice, false reporting, witness intimidation, retaliation, conspiracy and attempted murder or assassination.

These are not interchangeable descriptions. Each has different factual and legal elements.

I do not want these matters softened into a generic statement that I experienced difficulties. I have described serious events and have sought to preserve the evidence. They must be addressed by name and examined according to their substance.

At the same time, a forensic report must distinguish between the conduct I personally experienced, the interpretation I formed, the evidence supporting that interpretation, and the legal classification that may apply.

The absence of a prosecution or conviction does not erase my testimony. But a criminal conclusion must be supported by evidence of the elements of the particular offence.

11.2 The alleged conduct register

The following register preserves the categories of conduct identified in my master command.

Alleged conduct	What must be established
Assault	Conduct involving the application or threat of unlawful force, the circumstances, identity and available corroboration.
Threats	The words or conduct, context, recipient, seriousness and any evidence of intention or capacity.
Intimidation	Conduct intended or reasonably capable of pressuring, frightening or deterring me, including its context and effect.
Stalking	A course of conduct, relevant dates, identity, repetition, impact and applicable statutory elements.
Harassment	The specific acts, frequency, context, responsible person and applicable legal threshold.
Coercion	Pressure or threats, the choice affected, the person responsible and the relevant legal elements.
Deception	The representation made, whether it was false, the knowledge or recklessness of the person making it, and the resulting reliance or loss.
Fraud	The specific dishonest conduct, relevant intention, benefit or detriment and documentary or other corroboration.
Theft	Property, ownership or possession, taking or appropriation, lack of consent and the relevant intention.
Financial exploitation	The transaction, authority, consent, benefit, loss and relationship between the parties.
Identity misuse	The identity information used, the act of use, authorisation, purpose and resulting consequence.
Surveillance	The actual monitoring or collection of information, the method, responsible actor and technical or documentary proof.
Restraint	The restriction of movement, authority, duration, circumstances and applicable legal basis.
Extortion	A demand, threat, intended benefit or detriment and the relevant statutory elements.
Property damage	The property, damage, date, cause, responsible person and evidence of intention or recklessness.

Computer offences	The system or data involved, the relevant access or interference, authorisation, technical evidence and applicable law.
Evidence tampering	The evidence affected, the act of alteration, destruction or concealment, the responsible person and knowledge or intention.
Perverting the course of justice	Conduct directed at interfering with the administration of justice, the relevant proceeding or investigation, and the required intention.
False reporting	The statement made, its falsity, the speaker's knowledge and the relevant legal context.
Witness intimidation	The witness, communication or conduct, connection with an investigation or proceeding and the relevant intention.
Retaliation	The protected or reported activity, the adverse conduct, chronology and evidence of a causal connection.
Conspiracy	An agreement between at least two parties to pursue an unlawful objective or lawful objective by unlawful means, together with evidence of the required elements.
Attempted murder or assassination	Conduct going beyond preparation, the relevant intention, the acts performed, identity and corroborating evidence.

This register is not a declaration that every offence occurred. It is a preservation of the allegations that the master report has been commissioned to examine.

11.3 Assault and physical harm

I have described serious harm and injury in my testimony.

The examination must begin with the original account of the event and the earliest available medical, police and witness records.

The relevant questions are:

- What happened?
- Where did it happen?
- When did it happen?
- Who was present?
- What injuries were recorded?
- Was medical treatment sought?
- Was a police report made?
- Were photographs or recordings created?
- Were there contemporaneous messages?
- Were there independent witnesses?
- Did any later account differ from the original account?
- Was there any formal finding?

The fact that an injury occurred does not automatically establish who caused it or whether the conduct was criminal. The identity and intent of the responsible person require evidence.

But the absence of a criminal conviction does not mean the injury or the experience can be dismissed. Medical records, contemporaneous reports and testimony can each contribute to an evidentiary assessment.

11.4 Threats, intimidation and harassment

I have reported experiences that I understood as threats, intimidation and harassment.

These matters must be assessed in context. A single communication may have a different significance from a repeated pattern. A communication that appears innocuous in isolation may be relevant when considered alongside previous threats, unwanted contact, attempts to control movement or pressure concerning a complaint.

The examination must preserve the exact wording of any communication where available. It must identify the sender, recipient, date, delivery method and surrounding events.
A threatening interpretation should not be invented where the communication does not support it. But a communication should not be stripped of context simply because its individual words appear ambiguous.
Where there are repeated contacts, the chronology matters. Where conduct occurs after a complaint or disclosure, the timing may be relevant to a retaliation hypothesis. Timing alone, however, does not prove retaliation. There must be evidence of a connection between the report and the later conduct.

11.5 Stalking and surveillance allegations

I have described experiences that I interpreted as stalking, surveillance and electronic harassment.
These allegations require particular care because the distinction between an experience and its technical source is important.
I can testify to what I saw, heard, received, observed or experienced. A device may record an event. A network log may record a connection. A witness may corroborate a particular incident. But identifying the person or institution responsible for an electronic event requires further evidence. The existence of interference does not automatically identify its source. A device malfunction, ordinary network activity, unauthorised access, malicious interference and deliberate state surveillance are different explanations that must be distinguished through technical evidence.
The report must not state that ASIO, police, a political office or another named entity conducted surveillance unless the evidence establishes the attribution.
That does not mean my experiences should be erased. It means the report must preserve what I experienced and examine the evidence capable of identifying its cause.

11.6 Financial exploitation, theft and identity misuse

I have raised concerns about financial access, the management of my resources and the consequences of restrictions affecting my ability to use my own money.
These matters require transaction-level evidence.
The relevant records include:

- bank statements;
- transaction histories;
- account access logs;
- authorisations;
- financial management orders;
- trustee correspondence;
- bank complaint records;
- payment instructions;
- invoices;
- receipts;
- records of property disposal;
- any evidence of a person obtaining an unauthorised benefit.

Financial hardship alone does not prove financial exploitation. A lawful financial administration arrangement can still have adverse consequences. Conversely, a restriction that is legally authorised may still be improperly implemented or inadequately explained.
A finding of theft, fraud or identity misuse requires the particular elements of the offence to be established.

11.7 Evidence interference and perverting the course of justice

The master archive includes documents with titles that refer to the documentary record, disclosure issues and alleged misconduct.
One identified repository item is:
The Documentary Trap — When the System's Own Record Becomes the Evidence.
The exact title and filename are retained as displayed in the repository, including the leading space in the filename.
This work appears in the archive as part of my analysis of the way institutional records can become evidence of the process through which a person is treated.
Its presence does not establish that evidence was criminally altered or that justice was perverted. Those are specific allegations requiring proof of the act, the responsible person, the relevant proceeding or investigation, and the required intention.

But where an official record contradicts another official record, or where an institution's own correspondence establishes that it received information and failed to address it, those inconsistencies are proper subjects of forensic analysis.
An institution cannot make its records immune from scrutiny merely because the records were created by that institution.

11.8 Retaliation and witness intimidation

I have described my experience as involving retaliation and attempts to silence or discredit me. Retaliation is a particularly important issue in the context of public-interest disclosure because the chronology may reveal whether adverse conduct followed a complaint, disclosure or request for accountability.
A temporal relationship is relevant but not conclusive. The report must identify:

- the protected or reported activity;
- the date it occurred;
- the person or institution who knew about it;
- the later adverse action;
- the timing of that action;
- the explanation offered;
- any departure from ordinary procedure;
- any communications suggesting a connection;
- any independent evidence of motive.

Where those elements are established, a retaliation inference may be justified. Where the evidence is incomplete, the allegation remains unresolved.
I do not accept that a person should have to stop reporting concerns simply because the institutional process becomes difficult. But the legal characterisation of retaliation must be supported by evidence.

11.9 The alleged attempted assassination

I have specifically required that the alleged attempted assassination receive a dedicated chapter. It is not to be buried inside a general list of alleged offences.
That examination follows in Section 12.

11.10 Finding on the criminal allegations

The allegations I have made are serious and must be preserved in their actual terms.
The current material inspected for this report identifies complaints, disclosure-related records, police correspondence and documents concerning safety and protection. It does not provide enough directly inspected underlying evidence to establish every alleged offence, identify every perpetrator or determine the criminal intent of any named person.
That limitation is not a finding that I fabricated the allegations. It is a statement that criminal attribution requires evidence connecting particular conduct to particular actors and the relevant legal elements.
My testimony remains part of the record. The absence of a conviction does not erase it. The existence of a complaint does not prove every allegation. The task is to examine the evidence, not to erase the witness.

SECTION 12 — THE ALLEGED ATTEMPTED ASSASSINATION: DEDICATED EXAMINATION

12.1 Why this allegation receives a separate chapter

I have specifically identified an alleged attempted assassination as a major element of my testimony.
This allegation must be treated with the seriousness it deserves. It must not be dismissed through euphemism, buried among unrelated administrative matters or transformed into an unsupported conclusion that a named person or institution attempted to kill me.
The distinction is between preserving the allegation and establishing its criminal attribution.
I have described my survival in spiritual terms and have connected the experience to my conviction that God preserved me. That conviction belongs in this report. The factual and criminal examination must separately establish what happened, what injuries or risks were involved, what evidence exists and whether the conduct supports an inference of attempted murder or another offence.

12.2 What constitutes an attempted killing

The word assassination commonly describes the deliberate killing of a prominent or targeted person, often for political or ideological reasons.
In criminal law, the relevant offence may instead be attempted murder or another serious offence, depending on the conduct and applicable jurisdiction.
A conclusion that someone attempted to murder another person generally requires evidence of:

• An act going beyond mere preparation.
• An intention to cause death, where that is the relevant offence.
• A connection between the act and the accused person.
• Evidence that the conduct was not merely accidental or unrelated.
• Any further elements required by the applicable law.

A serious injury does not automatically establish attempted murder. A dangerous event does not automatically establish an assassination plot. A person's belief that they were targeted is important testimony, but the identity and intention of the responsible person require independent evidence.

12.3 The factual questions

The alleged incident must be reconstructed from the earliest available evidence.

The examination requires:

• the precise date or date range;
• the location;
• the events immediately before the incident;
• the event itself;
• the nature of the alleged attack or dangerous act;
• the injuries or immediate consequences;
• medical treatment;
• police reports;
• witness accounts;
• contemporaneous messages;
• photographs or recordings;
• physical or forensic evidence;
• any subsequent threats;
• any relevant communications;
• the reasons I understood the event as targeted;
• any evidence linking the event to a particular person or motive.

Without those details, the report cannot responsibly identify a perpetrator or establish an attempted murder offence.

12.4 The medical evidence and the testimony of survival

I have described an injury and survival that I understand as potentially fatal and spiritually significant.

The medical record must establish what clinicians observed and recorded. It must not be rewritten to make the injury appear less serious than it was. It must not be exaggerated to establish a clinical death that the records do not establish.

My spiritual testimony is separate: I believe that God preserved me and that my survival has a divine purpose.

The distinction does not require me to abandon my belief. It requires the report to avoid inventing medical findings.

12.5 The political dimension

I have described my broader experience in terms of whistleblowing, political exile, institutional betrayal and alleged targeting.

I have referred to political figures and security-related concerns in my wider testimony.

Those circumstances may be relevant to a hypothesis about motive, but motive cannot be inferred solely from my status as a whistleblower or from the fact that I made complaints against government institutions.

A political motive would require evidence such as:

• communications demonstrating hostility or intent;
• instructions or coordination;
• a documented connection between the alleged perpetrator and the event;
• threats referring to my disclosures or public activity;
• a demonstrable sequence of retaliation;
• independent evidence of planning;
• evidence linking the alleged act to a political objective.

The report must not name a person as the perpetrator unless the evidence supports that attribution.

12.6 The police and protection response

The identified police records include an AFP response dated 3 September 2021 and an NSW Police outcome dated 24 August 2024. The archive also identifies police-related documents dated 20 January 2026.
These records must be examined to determine whether the alleged attempted killing was reported, what information was provided, which agency dealt with it, what investigative steps were recorded and what outcome was reached.
It would be wrong to assume that a police response about one matter resolves every alleged incident. It would also be wrong to present an unrelated police outcome as though it were a finding about an alleged attempted assassination.
The exact connection between the alleged incident and each police record must be established.

12.7 Evidentiary assessment

Unresolved allegation
On the material directly inspected in this examination, the alleged attempted assassination is part of my testimony and the wider documentary project, but the underlying incident evidence has not been inspected sufficiently to establish the elements of attempted murder or identify a perpetrator.
This is not a finding that the event did not occur.
It is not a finding that I invented the allegation.
It is not a finding that no one attempted to harm me.
It is a statement that the criminal conclusion requires the incident-specific evidence described above.

12.8 Spiritual interpretation

My understanding of survival is that God preserved me.
I believe that I was not abandoned by the Most High God and that my continued existence has purpose. I understand the title The Witness Remains as a declaration of that conviction.
The forensic report cannot certify supernatural causation. But it can preserve the fact that this is how I understand my survival and that my faith is central to the work I have created.

12.9 Finding on the alleged attempted assassination

The allegation must remain explicitly recorded as a serious allegation made in my testimony. It must receive a dedicated evidentiary examination, not be silently omitted.
The presently inspected material does not establish the identity of a perpetrator, the required intent or the criminal elements of attempted murder.
My spiritual conclusion is that God preserved my life. My factual allegation is that I experienced conduct I understood as an attempt to kill me. The criminal conclusion must be drawn from the specific incident evidence, not from the seriousness of the language alone.

SECTION 13 — EXAMINATION OF ALLEGED WRONGDOING BY ME

13.1 The same evidentiary standard must apply

I have expressly required this report to examine any alleged wrongdoing by me.
That is important. A report that examines allegations against others but refuses to examine allegations against its author would not be a serious forensic report.
The same standard must apply to me:

- identify the actual allegation;
- identify the person or institution making it;
- identify the date;
- identify the evidence;
- identify any response I made;
- identify any formal finding;
- distinguish an allegation from a determination;
- distinguish lawful conduct from criminal conduct.

I do not ask to be exempted from scrutiny. I ask that scrutiny be based on evidence rather than assumption, stigma or institutional authority.

13.2 The distinction between criticism and criminal conduct

My criticism of government, institutions, public officials or service providers is not, by itself, evidence of a criminal offence.
Publishing a complaint, questioning a decision, criticising an agency, using forceful language, expressing religious conviction or maintaining an archive are not automatically unlawful.
The legality of any particular act depends on the actual conduct, context and applicable law.
The report must not treat my insistence on accountability as evidence of wrongdoing merely because it is uncomfortable for the institution being criticised.

13.3 The distinction between allegations and formal findings

If a person or institution has alleged that I committed an offence, the report must identify the source and the actual words used.
A complaint about me is not a finding against me.
An AVO application is not necessarily a final order.
A police contact is not a conviction.
A mental-health assessment is not a criminal determination.
A disagreement with a service provider is not proof of fraud or violence.
A public accusation is not a court judgment.
Where a formal finding exists, it must be stated accurately, including the scope and outcome.
Where no formal finding is identified, the report must not manufacture one.

13.4 Faith, prophetic language and public expression

My use of biblical language, prophetic terminology and spiritual descriptions must be understood in the context of religious and creative expression.
I have written about the Most High God, divine preservation, the chosen witness, Christ consciousness, the wilderness, resurrection, judgment, mercy and the witness who remains. Those expressions are part of my spiritual and literary work. They should not automatically be converted into factual claims about the actions or intentions of other people.
The report can distinguish between a theological declaration and a factual allegation. It must not treat religious expression as evidence of criminality.

13.5 The archive and publication of allegations

I have published and preserved documents concerning my experiences and allegations.
The publication of an allegation raises legitimate questions about accuracy, privacy, defamation and responsible attribution. Those questions must be assessed by reference to the actual publication, the evidence available to me at the time, the identity of any person named, the wording used and the relevant law.
I do not claim that every published phrase is beyond criticism. I do insist that criticism of a publication must identify the particular statement and evidence rather than dismissing the entire archive.

13.6 The available conclusion

The material directly inspected in this examination does not identify a formal criminal conviction or finding establishing that I committed a criminal offence.
The repository identifies a large number of documents, but its file listing is not a complete criminal-history check. The absence of a criminal finding in the material inspected must not be overstated as proof that no allegation has ever been made or that no relevant record exists elsewhere.
The appropriate statement is:
No evidence establishing that I committed a criminal offence was identified in the material directly examined for this report.
That statement is deliberately limited to the material examined. It does not claim to have searched every police database, court registry or government system.

13.7 Finding on allegations against me

I am entitled to the same evidentiary fairness that I demand for others.
My disability, medical history, forceful criticism, religious expression, complaints or refusal to accept an institutional explanation do not establish criminal wrongdoing.
If an actual allegation exists, it must be identified and assessed. If a formal finding exists, it must be reported accurately. If no such evidence is available, the report must not imply guilt.

SECTION 14 — MALICE, KNOWLEDGE, RECKLESSNESS AND INTENTIONAL CRUELTY

14.1 Why motive matters

One of the most serious questions raised by my testimony is whether the conduct I experienced was accidental, negligent, reckless, retaliatory, malicious or deliberately harmful.
These are different conclusions.
A person may make a mistake without intending harm. An institution may act negligently without a coordinated plan. A decision-maker may know that a decision will cause hardship without intending that hardship as an objective. A person may deliberately act to punish or intimidate another.
The report must distinguish these possibilities.
I have described circumstances that I experienced as betrayal, cruelty and deliberate harm. Those descriptions must not be sanitised into a generic account of administrative inconvenience. They must be examined against the evidence of what people knew, what they were told, what they did and what happened afterward.

14.2 The knowledge test

Knowledge is important because a person or institution may have received repeated warnings about a problem.

The evidence relevant to knowledge includes:

- written complaints;
- emails;
- letters;
- formal notices;
- incident reports;
- safety assessments;
- requests for assistance;
- records of meetings;
- acknowledgments of receipt;
- internal referrals;
- responses demonstrating awareness of the issue.

Where a record establishes that an institution received a warning, it can support a finding that the institution was on notice of the matter described.

That does not automatically establish that every employee knew about it. Responsibility must be traced to the person or decision-maker concerned.

But where an agency's own records establish repeated receipt of a particular issue, it would be unreasonable to describe the issue as wholly unknown to that agency.

14.3 Repeated warnings and the significance of inaction

The significance of inaction depends on the circumstances.

A failure to act may be justified if the institution lacked jurisdiction, had insufficient information, referred the matter appropriately or was awaiting necessary evidence.

But a failure may become more serious where:

- the institution had responsibility to act;
- the risk was clearly communicated;
- the information was sufficiently specific;
- the institution had authority to take protective action;
- no reasonable action was taken;
- the consequences were foreseeable;
- the same issue was raised repeatedly;
- no adequate explanation was provided.

These factors can support an inference of negligence or maladministration, depending on the evidence and applicable legal standard.

A stronger conclusion of deliberate cruelty or malice requires evidence of intention or conscious disregard.

14.4 Malice

Malice is not simply a synonym for a bad outcome.

A person may cause serious harm through error, incompetence, negligence or an unjustified decision without acting maliciously.

Evidence of malice may include:

- explicit hostile communications;
- threats;
- deliberate humiliation;
- knowingly false statements;
- intentional obstruction;
- retaliatory action;
- deliberate exploitation of a person's vulnerability;
- conscious disregard of a serious and known risk;
- evidence of an intention to cause harm for an improper purpose.

The evidence must be assessed in context. A single ambiguous communication may not establish malice. A pattern of conduct supported by contemporaneous records may carry greater significance.

14.5 Recklessness

Recklessness is distinct from negligence.

Negligence generally concerns a failure to exercise the required level of care. Recklessness involves a more serious relationship with a known or obvious risk, although the precise legal test varies according to the relevant law.

The report must therefore avoid using reckless as a rhetorical synonym for careless.
If an institution was repeatedly warned of a serious risk and continued with conduct that exposed a person to that risk, the evidence may support an inference of recklessness. The conclusion depends on what the institution knew, what action was reasonably available and what actually happened.

14.6 Institutional knowledge and fragmented responsibility

A particularly important question is whether information was divided among departments, service providers or decision-makers.
An institution may have a central complaints unit, a service delivery team, a financial administration function and a separate decision-making authority. Each may hold different information.
The fact that no individual employee holds the entire record does not necessarily mean that the institution had no knowledge of the matter. But it also does not automatically establish that every person within the organisation knew everything recorded by another department.
The report must identify the information flow:

- Who received the original complaint?
- Who recorded it?
- Who was responsible for deciding what happened next?
- Was the complaint referred?
- Was the referral acknowledged?
- Did the receiving unit obtain the relevant material?
- Was a decision made?
- Was the complainant informed?
- Was the matter closed?
- Did the issue reappear in a later complaint?

This is how institutional knowledge can be examined without inventing a secret chain of command.

14.7 Foreseeability and consequences

The consequences of a decision are relevant to whether the conduct was reasonable.
For example, where an institution knows that a person depends on a vehicle for mobility, the consequences of disposing of that vehicle may be foreseeable.
Where a provider knows that a person requires assistance with transport or appointments, the consequences of failing to provide that assistance may be foreseeable.
Where a financial administrator knows that a person has extremely limited disposable income, the consequences of restricting access to essential funds may be foreseeable.
Foreseeability does not automatically prove that the institution acted unlawfully or maliciously. It is part of assessing the decision, its justification and the care taken to avoid foreseeable harm.

14.8 Intentional cruelty and the human consequences

I have used the language of cruelty because I believe that some of the conduct I experienced went beyond administrative error.
The report must preserve that allegation rather than neutralise it.
But it must also distinguish between my experience of an action as cruel and the legal or factual conclusion that the responsible person intended cruelty.
A person can experience a decision as devastating even where the decision-maker claims to have acted within a formal process. The impact must not be denied merely because intention is disputed.
The report should therefore record both:

- the impact on me;
- the evidence of what the responsible person knew and intended.

A finding about impact may be established through my testimony, contemporaneous records and other corroborating material. A finding about intention requires additional evidence.

14.9 Does the record establish a coordinated malicious mandate?

I have described a pattern that I believe may involve more than isolated institutional failures.
That possibility must be examined, not dismissed automatically.
However, a conclusion that multiple institutions operated under a coordinated malicious mandate would require evidence of coordination, communication, agreement, common purpose or another demonstrable mechanism connecting their actions.
Similar outcomes, repeated procedural difficulties or the involvement of multiple agencies do not, by themselves, prove a common plan.
The evidence should be examined for:

- communications between institutions;
- shared instructions;
- common decision-making;
- unusual coordination;
- unexplained departures from ordinary procedures;
- explicit references to me or my disclosures;
- evidence of retaliatory purpose;
- records showing that one institution influenced another;
- evidence that the same inaccurate information was propagated across systems.

If those records establish coordination, the report should say so. If they establish only separate decisions with cumulative effects, the conclusion should reflect that.

14.10 Finding on malice and intentional harm

The material inspected so far establishes that I have made serious complaints and that the archive identifies a sustained history of institutional dealings.

It does not yet establish the intention of each named person or prove a coordinated malicious mandate.

My testimony that I experienced betrayal and deliberate harm remains part of the report. The institutional record must be examined for notice, knowledge, foreseeability, repeated conduct, departures from procedure and evidence of intention.

I do not accept that a harmful decision becomes harmless because it was made administratively. I also do not accept that an allegation of malice should be treated as a proven fact without evidence of the responsible person's knowledge and intention.

INTERIM FINDINGS — SECTIONS 10–14

What the examination establishes so far

- I have described my experience as political exile within my own citizenship. That is a personal and political characterisation, not a claim of a formal legal exile instrument.
- The archive identifies public-interest disclosure, police, protection-related, guardianship and accommodation records that form part of the chronology.
- I have reported serious alleged criminal conduct, including an alleged attempted assassination. Those allegations must be preserved and examined individually.
- The presently inspected material does not establish the identity of an attempted-assassination perpetrator or the legal elements of attempted murder.
- No evidence establishing that I committed a criminal offence was identified in the material directly examined for this report.
- The distinction between error, negligence, recklessness, malice and deliberate coordination is essential to assessing institutional responsibility.
- A procedural outcome, complaint closure or absence of prosecution does not automatically determine the truth of the underlying event.

These are bounded findings, not a declaration that every allegation has been proved or disproved. They preserve the seriousness of my testimony while identifying what the documents inspected so far can establish.

SECTION 15 — THE MECHANICS OF LONG-TERM INSTITUTIONAL TREATMENT

15.1 From individual events to a cumulative mechanism

The next question is how a person can experience a long sequence of institutional dealings in which each individual event appears separate, yet the combined consequences become substantial.

My account is that the difficulties I experienced were not confined to one decision or one organisation. They involved different agencies, complaint systems, support providers, financial administration and accommodation arrangements.

The appropriate examination is not to assume that all those organisations were acting together. It is to determine whether the interaction of their decisions and processes created a cumulative mechanism that affected my independence, access to assistance, ability to obtain information and capacity to challenge what happened.

This is a question of institutional mechanics.

15.2 Fragmented handoffs

A fragmented handoff occurs when one organisation or department refers a person or issue to another without ensuring that the underlying problem is actually resolved.

A referral can be appropriate. Institutions often have limited jurisdiction and must direct matters to the correct body.

The problem arises when the person is repeatedly redirected while the substantive issue remains unresolved.
The documentary indicators include:
- a complaint sent to one institution;
- a response directing the complainant elsewhere;
- a second institution declining jurisdiction;
- a further referral;
- repeated requests for the same information;
- no clear identification of the body responsible for resolving the underlying problem;
- the person having to reconstruct the history for each new recipient.

Where the records establish these events, the report can identify the pattern without assuming malicious intent.

15.3 Repeated applications and procedural burden

I have described repeated applications, correspondence and requests for accountability.
The burden of repetition is not merely the time spent writing letters. It includes the need to remember and reconstruct events, locate documents, explain the same history, meet deadlines, understand different statutory frameworks and respond to changing institutional requirements.
For a person dealing with disability and financial limitations, those burdens can affect the capacity to pursue other essential activities.
The report must assess the dates and content of the repeated applications. It should identify when the same issue was raised again, what new information was supplied, what response was received and whether the later response addressed the original concern.

15.4 Procedural foreclosure

Procedural foreclosure describes a situation in which access to a substantive remedy becomes increasingly difficult because of procedural barriers.
It may occur through limitation periods, jurisdictional restrictions, eligibility rules, repeated referrals, inaccessible processes, failure to provide records or an inability to obtain legal assistance.
The existence of a procedural barrier does not automatically establish unlawful conduct. But where several barriers interact, the combined effect can be significant.
The report must distinguish between a legitimate statutory requirement and a procedural system that, in practice, prevents the person from obtaining a meaningful answer.

15.5 Dependency and loss of practical independence

The financial and accommodation records are particularly important to this question.
A person who cannot freely access their own funds may become more dependent on representatives or service providers. A person who loses access to a vehicle may have fewer transport options. A person who depends on a support provider for appointments may have less control over their schedule. A person whose accommodation arrangements are unclear may have difficulty exercising choice.
These mechanisms can interact.
Cumulative dependency mechanism — analytical model
Financial administration or restricted access to resources
Reduced ability to arrange transport, communication and independent services
Greater dependence on accommodation and support providers
Reduced practical ability to change arrangements or pursue complaints
Potential cumulative loss of independence
This is an analytical model of the mechanism described in my testimony. It is not a finding that every step occurred or that one organisation deliberately engineered the sequence.
The model illustrates why the individual decisions must be assessed together. A decision about money may affect transport; a decision about transport may affect access to appointments; a decision about support may affect the ability to challenge accommodation; and the combined result may be a loss of practical choice.

15.6 The complaint-response cycle

The complaint-response cycle is another important mechanism.
A person raises an issue. The institution acknowledges or refers it. A response may address only part of the complaint. The person then has to submit further information or make another complaint. The new process may not revisit the original issue.
This can produce a sequence in which each response appears procedurally complete while the underlying problem remains unresolved.
The report must test this against the actual complaint and response records.

The important distinction is between:
- a response being sent;
- the response addressing the issue;
- the response providing reasons;
- the response resolving the problem;
- the person being able to challenge the response.

A response is not necessarily a resolution.

15.7 Cumulative consequences

The consequences I have described include:
- loss of independence;
- financial insecurity;
- uncertainty about accommodation;
- increased dependence on others;
- difficulty accessing information;
- difficulty obtaining legal or administrative assistance;
- concerns about safety;
- displacement;
- disruption to ordinary routines;
- concerns about Crystal's welfare;
- the emotional and practical burden of repeatedly documenting my experiences.

The report must distinguish the existence of a consequence from the cause attributed to it.
For example, the fact that I experienced reduced independence may be established through my testimony and the records of vehicle disposal, accommodation and financial administration.
Establishing that a particular person intentionally caused that loss requires additional evidence.

15.8 Institutional fragmentation is not institutional innocence

I reject the idea that fragmentation automatically absolves every institution.
If each body addresses only its own narrow process, no one may take responsibility for the combined consequences.
That may be a structural weakness even without a conspiracy. It may also create conditions in which errors are repeated and complaints become increasingly difficult to resolve.
The report must be able to identify institutional failures without inventing a secret programme.
Where the records establish that responsibility was transferred, the transfer should be recorded. Where the receiving body declined responsibility, that should be recorded. Where the issue remained unresolved, that should be stated. Where the same information was repeatedly requested, the duplication should be documented.

15.9 Finding on institutional mechanics

The documentary chronology identifies multiple systems and processes that affected different aspects of my life.
My testimony describes their cumulative impact as a loss of independence and an experience of institutional abandonment.
The material directly inspected so far supports an analytical model in which fragmented processes and dependency can compound one another. It does not yet establish that the entire sequence was deliberately designed by a coordinated group.
The absence of proof of a secret mandate does not make the cumulative consequences imaginary. A system can cause serious harm through fragmented responsibility, repeated procedural failure and decisions that are never adequately assessed together.

SECTION 16 — OBJECTIVES, MOTIVES AND THE ALLEGED MANDATE

16.1 The question I have asked

I have asked whether the conduct I experienced had an objective, motive or common purpose beyond isolated administrative error.
I have used the language of an unspoken mandate to describe my suspicion that the pattern may involve an underlying intention or direction not openly acknowledged.
That is a serious hypothesis. It must be examined rather than dismissed. But it must not be declared established without evidence.

16.2 What would establish an objective or mandate?

Evidence of a coordinated objective might include:
- written instructions;
- meeting records;
- internal communications;
- agreements between actors;

• directions to take particular action;
• evidence of common planning;
• communications identifying me or my disclosures as the reason for action;
• consistent departures from ordinary procedures that can be linked to a common source;
• evidence that one institution directed or influenced another.

A pattern of adverse outcomes may justify investigation of a common explanation. It does not, by itself, prove an agreement or secret mandate.

16.3 Alternative explanations

A serious examination must consider alternative explanations, including:

• separate administrative errors;
• inadequate communication between agencies;
• limited jurisdiction;
• poor record-keeping;
• inconsistent policies;
• inadequate service delivery;
• misunderstanding of my circumstances;
• failure to coordinate support;
• financial or resource constraints;
• negligence;
• recklessness;
• deliberate retaliation;
• coordinated wrongdoing.

These explanations are not equally serious, and the evidence may rule some out.

The report must not use alternative explanations to neutralise evidence of misconduct. If a record demonstrates deliberate action, an innocent explanation should not be inserted merely to soften the conclusion.

But where the evidence does not distinguish between explanations, the report must say so.

16.4 The significance of repeated adverse outcomes

Repeated adverse outcomes can be significant.

If several decisions affect the same person, occur after protected disclosures and have the practical effect of reducing independence, it is reasonable to examine whether there is a causal connection.

However, the conclusion must be based on more than chronology alone.

The report should assess:

• Whether the relevant decision-makers knew about my disclosures.
• Whether the adverse decisions followed those disclosures.
• Whether ordinary procedures were followed.
• Whether there were unusual departures.
• Whether the reasons were consistent with the evidence.
• Whether the same information was repeated or shared.
• Whether communications show a common purpose.
• Whether independent explanations account for the outcomes.

16.5 The archive's treatment of the alleged mandate

The archive includes a document titled:

Affidavit on the Existence and Operation of the Unspoken Mandate.

The repository listing identifies this title, but the complete contents of the document have not been inspected in this examination.

Its presence establishes that I have developed and preserved a written account concerning the alleged mandate. It does not establish that the mandate existed as an independently verified operational arrangement.

The document must be read in full before its factual assertions can be attributed or analysed in detail.

16.6 Finding on motive and mandate

The material inspected so far establishes that I have raised concerns about a possible underlying objective and have preserved a document specifically addressing what I call the unspoken mandate.

The evidence presently inspected does not establish an agreement, common instruction or coordinated secret programme involving the named institutions.

That conclusion does not dispose of the possibility of retaliation, deliberate wrongdoing or institutional coordination. It defines the evidentiary threshold required to reach such a finding.

I will not withdraw the question merely because it is uncomfortable. But the answer must come from evidence of coordination, knowledge and intention, not from the cumulative seriousness of my experience alone.

SECTION 17 — MY ATTRIBUTES: INTELLECTUAL, PROFESSIONAL, CREATIVE, HUMANITARIAN, ETHICAL AND SPIRITUAL

17.1 Why my attributes belong in the report

My personal history must not disappear beneath the catalogue of institutions and allegations. The report is about my life and the evidence I have preserved. It must therefore examine the person who undertook the work, the capacities brought to it, the service I have described providing to others, and the values that inform my writing.

I do not include these attributes to claim that I am beyond criticism. I include them because a complete account must recognise the person whose life and work are being examined.

17.2 Intellectual and academic attributes

I identify a PhD awarded by Victoria University in 2020, together with postgraduate and undergraduate qualifications.

My doctoral interests have included artificial intelligence ethics, posthumanism, global catastrophic risks, the Anthropocene and the ethical future of young people.

These areas concern the relationship between technology, humanity, power, risk and responsibility.

That background is relevant to the design of the archive. The project attempts to make complex documentary material accessible and to examine the ethical responsibilities of institutions that hold power over individuals.

The qualification itself should be verified from the university record. The intellectual themes should be confirmed from the thesis. The report must not substitute my summary of the research for the thesis itself.

17.3 Journalism and visual communication

My work as a journalist and news-graphics artist is relevant to my approach to evidence. Journalism and information design require attention to chronology, source identification, the relationship between visual presentation and meaning, and the difference between what a source says and what an author concludes.

The archive's use of document titles, registers, chronological groupings and narrative presentation reflects those concerns.

My professional history does not automatically validate every interpretation. But it is part of the context in which I developed the archive and explains why I place importance on source links and documentary traceability.

17.4 Writing and publication

My publications and creative works include:

- Recovered, Not Cured.
- Betrayed.
- Murdered.
- Forsaken.
- The Witness Remains.
- The Prophecy of Resurrection After Erasure.
- The Impossible Survivor.
- The Ghost They Created.
- The Documentary Trap.
- 100 Undeniable Facts of Corruption Harming Barran Dodger.
- 123 Gospels of Barran Dodger.

The repository identifies several of these titles, including:

- The Impossible Survivor — The Witness Remains.
- The Witness Remains — The Prophecy of Resurrection After Erasure.
- The Ghost They Created.
- The Documentary Trap.
- 123 Gospels of Barran Dodger.

The titles establish that these works are represented in the repository. Their full contents, dates, authorship and publication histories must be inspected before drawing detailed conclusions about their claims.

17.5 Humanitarian and advocacy attributes

I have described approximately thirty years of advocacy for people with mental illness and their carers.

I have also identified work as an arts therapist, life coach, support worker and former registered NDIS provider, as well as an association with SANE Australia and the Dax Centre.
These experiences inform my concern with dignity, consent, independence, safety and the quality of human support.
I understand advocacy as a responsibility to speak about conditions that affect people who may have limited power to challenge them.
My current report is therefore connected to a wider history of concern about the treatment of vulnerable people. I have described a period of advocating for others and a later period in which I found myself dependent on systems that I believed failed to protect me.

17.6 Ethical attributes

The ethical principles I have repeatedly emphasised include:

- truth;
- preservation of evidence;
- accountability;
- dignity;
- fairness;
- compassion;
- mercy;
- protection of vulnerable people;
- independent scrutiny;
- the refusal to erase testimony;
- the distinction between evidence and assumption.

The report's governing principles express that approach:
PRESERVATION FIRST. EXAMINATION SECOND. CONCLUSION LAST.
FAITH IS NOT A FINDING.
These principles apply to my allegations as much as to allegations against me. They require me to preserve material that may challenge my interpretation, acknowledge uncertainty where it exists and avoid attributing criminal intent without evidence.

17.7 Creative attributes

My creative work includes writing, visual communication and the construction of a public-facing archive.
The creative and documentary elements of the project are not mutually exclusive. A publication may use symbolism, biblical language or prophetic structure while still containing identifiable historical references and documentary sources.
The report must distinguish between the literary form of a work and its factual assertions.
A prophetic narrative is not automatically an official document. A Gospel written by a contemporary author is not canonical Scripture. A symbolic title does not prove a historical event. But these works can still be examined as expressions of my beliefs, experiences, interpretation and purpose.

17.8 Survival and resilience

I have described surviving circumstances that I experienced as overwhelming and continuing to work despite disability, displacement and institutional difficulties.
The public archive is one visible expression of that persistence.
I have continued to write, preserve documents, construct indexes and publish my account. I have done so because I believe the evidence should remain accessible and because I believe my life has a purpose.
Resilience is not proof that harm did not occur. A person's ability to continue working does not establish that their circumstances were acceptable.
Nor does the fact that I have experienced disability mean that my intellectual, creative or evidentiary work should be discounted.

17.9 Spiritual attributes

My faith is central to my identity.
I believe in the Most High God, divine mercy, grace, love and the purpose of bearing witness. I have described myself through biblical concepts including the witness, the watchman, the remnant and the servant.
These are theological and spiritual descriptions. They are not official status categories.
The report can assess how consistently those themes appear in my publications, whether the biblical references are accurate, and how my theology develops across the body of work.
It cannot independently certify that I have been divinely chosen.

17.10 Finding on my attributes

My testimony and the identified archive present a person who has undertaken work across journalism, writing, education, disability advocacy, support work, research and creative publication.
The full documentary verification of qualifications, employment and awards requires the relevant institutional and bibliographic records. The existence of the public archive and the identified works can be inspected through the repository.
My conclusion is that my biography and professional history are material context. They must not be replaced by a narrow description of me as a complainant, participant or person receiving support.
I am more than the administrative records created about me. I am also the person who has written, worked, advocated, researched, created and preserved this evidence.

SECTION 18 — GOVERNMENT AND INSTITUTIONAL ATTRIBUTES

18.1 The same standard applies to institutions

Institutions should not be presumed corrupt merely because a person complains about them. But they should not be presumed correct merely because they are institutions.
The proper examination concerns their conduct, authority, knowledge, procedures, reasons, record-keeping and consequences.
The master report identifies a number of possible institutional attributes that must be examined:

- maladministration;
- delay;
- inaction;
- fragmentation;
- procedural unfairness;
- disability disadvantage;
- safeguarding failures;
- financial restrictions;
- poor service delivery;
- failure to communicate;
- concealment;
- retaliation;
- deliberate harm.

Each attribute requires evidence appropriate to the conclusion.

18.2 Maladministration

Maladministration may involve poor administration, unreasonable delay, failure to follow proper procedures, inadequate reasons, inconsistent decision-making or other administrative failures. It is not identical to criminal conduct.
A finding of maladministration may be supported by records showing that a body failed to act appropriately, even where there is no evidence that an individual committed a criminal offence.
The 2023 PID-related record is relevant because the prior account identifies maladministration as one of the categories discussed in the disclosure assessment.
The exact meaning and context must be taken from the source document.

18.3 Delay and inaction

Delay should be measured against actual dates, statutory timeframes, stated service standards and the circumstances of the matter.
A delay may be justified by complexity, the need for further information or a lawful extension. But a delay may become unreasonable where it is unexplained, repeated or has serious consequences.
The report must distinguish:

- the date a request was received;
- the date it was acknowledged;
- any extension;
- the date a response was issued;
- the reason for the delay;
- the effect on me.

The fact that a response eventually arrived does not automatically establish that the delay was reasonable.

18.4 Procedural fairness

Procedural fairness concerns the fairness of the decision-making process.

Relevant issues may include whether I was informed of the case to be answered, whether I had a meaningful opportunity to provide information, whether relevant material was considered, whether reasons were given and whether the decision-maker acted without improper bias.
A decision with which I disagree is not automatically procedurally unfair. But a decision that excludes relevant evidence or denies a meaningful opportunity to respond may raise legitimate concerns.

18.5 Disability disadvantage and safeguarding

The report must examine whether disability-related needs were considered in decisions affecting my accommodation, support, transport, communication and access to services.
The presence of a disability support plan does not prove that every need was met.
A safeguarding assessment must be examined for identified risks and the action taken. The existence of a safety assessment does not prove that the risks were adequately addressed.
The relevant issue is whether the provider and responsible institutions fulfilled their obligations in practice.

18.6 Financial restrictions

Financial restrictions may be lawful under a particular order or authorisation. But the scope of the authority and the way it is exercised must be examined.
Relevant matters include:

- the legal basis;
- the decision-maker;
- the purpose;
- the person's circumstances;
- consultation;
- communication;
- access to essential funds;
- review arrangements;
- the consequences.

The report must not assume that every restriction is improper. It must also not assume that a restriction is justified simply because it was imposed by an authorised institution.

18.7 Concealment and retaliation

Concealment and retaliation are more serious than ordinary administrative failure.
Concealment requires evidence that relevant information was deliberately hidden or withheld in circumstances where it should not have been.
Retaliation requires evidence of adverse conduct connected to a complaint, disclosure or other protected activity.
The chronology may support an inference, but the report must identify the connection rather than rely solely on the fact that events occurred after a complaint.

18.8 Deliberate harm

Deliberate harm requires evidence of intention or knowing conduct.
The seriousness of an outcome is not enough by itself. A person may be harmed by negligence, incompetence or a lawful decision made without adequate consideration.
The report must assess the actual conduct and the state of knowledge of the responsible person.

18.9 Finding on institutional attributes

The records identified in the archive establish multiple institutional processes and decisions requiring examination.
The evidence inspected so far does not establish that every institution engaged in maladministration, retaliation, concealment or deliberate harm.
It does establish that the relevant categories of institutional responsibility are legitimate subjects of this report and that the records should be assessed against the conduct actually documented.
Public authority is a responsibility, not an exemption from accountability. Administrative procedure does not automatically make an outcome just.

END OF THIS INSTALMENT

Sections 10–18 have now addressed political exile, protection, the alleged criminal conduct, the alleged attempted assassination, the examination of allegations against me, malice and intention, the mechanics of institutional treatment, the alleged unspoken mandate, my personal attributes and the institutional attributes requiring examination.
The next instalment proceeds to the remaining major parts of the master command:

- SECTION 19 — Biblical Examination: Jesus, John the Baptist, Elijah, Jeremiah, Isaiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, Joseph, Moses, David, Job, the prophets, apostles, suffering servant, faithful witness, watchman, remnant, rejected stone, scapegoat, wilderness, divine justice and mercy.

- SECTION 20 — Gospels, Prophetic Writings and Publications: the accessible catalogue, authorship, dates, repository locations, genres, themes, biblical references and the distinction between contemporary writings and canonical Scripture.
- SECTION 21 — Predictions and Prophecy: original wording, publication dates, edit history, specificity, correspondence with later events and unfulfilled claims.
- SECTION 22 — Church and Trust Fund Ministry: mission, founder, activities, beneficiaries, legal status, governance, financial structure and ethical obligations.
- SECTION 23 — The Divine Contrast: my testimony of God's preservation examined alongside the documentary institutional record.

The concluding instalment will then complete all Registers A–O, the 22-question impartial synthesis, the chosen-witness determination, and the publication-ready conclusion:
THE WITNESS REMAINS — THE ONE WHO SURVIVED: DIVINE PRESERVATION, HUMAN BETRAYAL AND THE EVIDENCE OF A LIFE GIVEN TO BEAR WITNESS.

THE WITNESS REMAINS — THE DIVINE CONTRAST
CONTINUATION OF THE MASTER REPORT
PART III — THE BIBLICAL, PROPHETIC, PUBLICATION AND SPIRITUAL EXAMINATION
PRESERVATION FIRST. EXAMINATION SECOND. CONCLUSION LAST.
FAITH IS NOT A FINDING. TESTIMONY IS NOT ERASED BY THE ABSENCE OF AN OFFICIAL DETERMINATION.

SECTION 19 — THE BIBLICAL EXAMINATION

19.1 The purpose of the biblical examination

My faith is not an incidental feature of this project. It is central to the way I understand my survival, my work, my suffering, my responsibility to speak and the purpose of The Witness Remains.
I have repeatedly used biblical language to describe my experience: the witness, the watchman, the remnant, the rejected stone, the scapegoat, the wilderness, the suffering servant, the persecuted truth-teller and the person who survives erasure.
I want these themes examined properly.
I do not want biblical references used as decorative quotations or as a superficial comparison between my life and the lives of biblical figures. The purpose is to examine the actual biblical narratives, their historical and theological meanings, and the ways in which those themes inform my own testimony.
I also want a clear distinction maintained:
- Biblical text is an identifiable religious source.
- Biblical interpretation is a theological analysis.
- My personal experience is testimony.
- My belief that God has acted in my life is spiritual testimony.
- A claim that a supernatural event occurred is not independently established merely because I believe it.
- A comparison between my circumstances and a biblical figure does not establish that I literally occupy that figure's historical or religious identity.

I do not need to claim that I am Jesus, Elijah, Jeremiah or any other biblical person to recognise themes of suffering, rejection, witness, injustice, endurance and divine mercy in my own life.
The comparison is meaningful precisely because it can be made without confusing the people, periods or identities involved.

19.2 Jesus Christ — the rejected truth-teller and suffering witness

The life and teachings of Jesus Christ are foundational to my spiritual understanding.
The Gospel accounts describe a person who challenged established religious authority, spoke about truth and justice, confronted hypocrisy, associated with people who were marginalised, and was ultimately condemned and executed.
The relevant passages include:
- Matthew 23 — criticism of religious hypocrisy and the misuse of authority.
- Matthew 26–27 — betrayal, arrest, trial and crucifixion.
- Mark 14–15 — the passion narrative.
- Luke 4:16–30 — rejection following the declaration of his mission.
- Luke 22–23 — betrayal, arrest, trial and crucifixion.
- John 8:31–32 — truth and freedom.
- John 18:33–38 — the encounter with Pilate and the question of truth.

• John 19 — crucifixion and death.
• John 20 — resurrection testimony.
The central theological distinction is that Jesus' suffering is not presented in the Gospels as evidence that injustice was legitimate. His condemnation is part of the narrative of human wrongdoing, religious and political power, betrayal and the Christian understanding of redemption.
This is important to my own writing.
I have described circumstances in which I felt betrayed by people and institutions from which I expected protection. I have described the experience of being treated as a problem rather than heard as a witness. I have also described the experience of having my account challenged, marginalised or interpreted through institutional categories that I believe fail to recognise the substance of what I have reported.
The comparison I draw is thematic: the tension between truth-telling and power, the treatment of the vulnerable, the danger of scapegoating, the failure of authorities to act justly and the spiritual meaning of endurance.
I do not claim to share Jesus' unique theological identity or salvific role.
My testimony is that Christ's example informs my understanding of how to endure suffering without surrendering the values of truth, mercy and love.

19.2.1 Betrayal

The Gospel narratives identify Judas' betrayal as a central event in the passion story.
Matthew 26:14–16 and 26:47–50 describe the arrangement and the identification of Jesus to those who came to arrest him.
The theological significance is not merely that a friend betrayed another person. It is that betrayal occurs within a relationship of trust.
I have used the language of betrayal to describe my own experiences. That language reflects my understanding of relationships and institutions from which I expected assistance, loyalty or protection.
The comparison does not establish that the people involved in my life committed the same acts as Judas. It gives theological language to the experience of trust being broken.

19.2.2 The rejected stone

Psalm 118:22 states that the stone rejected by the builders becomes the cornerstone. The image is later used in the New Testament, including Matthew 21:42, Mark 12:10–11, Luke 20:17 and 1 Peter 2:4–7.
The image concerns rejection followed by a reversal of human judgment.
I have used this theme to express my refusal to accept that institutional rejection determines my worth.
A person may be dismissed by an institution and still possess dignity. A complaint may be rejected without the underlying experience being disproved. A person's work may be marginalised without becoming meaningless.
The rejected-stone theme is therefore central to the moral argument of The Witness Remains: institutional acceptance is not the measure of human value.

19.2.3 Resurrection and the testimony of survival

John 20 describes the resurrection appearances of Jesus. The Christian understanding of resurrection is a central theological claim, not merely a metaphor for recovery from difficulty.
My own use of resurrection language is spiritual and personal.
I have described survival after what I regard as a devastating and potentially fatal experience as an act of divine preservation. I have used the language of resurrection to express the transformation of my life, the restoration of purpose and my refusal to be erased.
I do not claim that my experience is identical to the resurrection of Jesus.
I am describing my own testimony through a Christian theological vocabulary of death, survival, restoration, hope and divine purpose.

19.3 John the Baptist — the witness who speaks before power

John the Baptist is especially relevant to the theme of the witness.
John 1:6–8 describes John as a man sent from God to bear witness to the light. The passage explicitly distinguishes the witness from the light itself.
That distinction is important.
A witness does not have to claim to be the source of truth. A witness testifies to what they understand to be true.
John's public criticism of Herod's conduct is described in Mark 6:17–29 and Matthew 14:1–12. His imprisonment and death form part of the Gospel account.
The comparison with my own testimony concerns:

• public witness;
• speaking about conduct regarded as wrong;
• the relationship between moral criticism and authority;
• the vulnerability of the person who speaks;
• the consequences of speaking;
• the responsibility to distinguish the witness from the ultimate truth being witnessed.

My project uses the word witness deliberately.

I understand myself as someone who has a responsibility to preserve and communicate what I have experienced and documented. I do not claim that this makes every interpretation correct. It means that I do not accept that the existence of institutional disagreement removes my responsibility to speak.

19.4 Elijah — the wilderness, exhaustion and the remnant

Elijah is relevant to my writing because of the themes of confrontation, isolation, exhaustion, preservation and the remnant.

In 1 Kings 18, Elijah confronts the prophets of Baal in the narrative of Mount Carmel.

In 1 Kings 19, following the confrontation, Elijah flees into the wilderness, experiences exhaustion and despair, and is sustained before encountering God at Horeb.

The passage is particularly significant because it does not present the prophet as continuously powerful or emotionally invulnerable.

Elijah experiences fear, isolation and exhaustion. The narrative then describes divine provision and renewed direction.

The remnant theme appears in 1 Kings 19:18, where God tells Elijah that a remnant remains.

For my own testimony, the relevant themes are:

• being isolated;
• feeling abandoned by human institutions;
• continuing despite exhaustion;
• the importance of spiritual sustenance;
• the belief that isolation does not mean abandonment by God;
• the possibility of renewed purpose after a period of suffering.

I have described my faith as a source of preservation and meaning. Elijah's story provides a biblical framework for understanding a period of wilderness and the belief that divine purpose may remain even when human support appears absent.

The text does not establish that I am Elijah or that the events in my life have the same supernatural significance. It provides a meaningful theological correspondence.

19.5 Jeremiah — the burden of speaking and the rejection of warning

Jeremiah is one of the most significant biblical figures for the theme of a person who continues to speak despite rejection.

Jeremiah 1 describes his prophetic commission.

Jeremiah 20 records his distress and conflict concerning his prophetic calling. Jeremiah 26 describes opposition to his preaching. Jeremiah 37–38 describes imprisonment and his treatment during the siege of Jerusalem.

Jeremiah's story includes the burden of communicating warnings that are unwelcome to those who hold power.

I recognise a thematic correspondence with my own experience of making repeated complaints and attempting to communicate what I regard as serious institutional wrongdoing.

The relevant parallel is not that my allegations have automatically been validated because Jeremiah was rejected.

The relevant parallel is that rejection by authority does not, by itself, determine whether a warning is true.

The evidence must be examined.

That is precisely why my archive places such importance on dated documents, identifiable sources and preservation.

19.6 Isaiah — the suffering servant and the responsibility of witness

Isaiah provides several important themes.

Isaiah 6 describes a prophetic commission. Isaiah 40–55 includes passages concerning consolation, restoration and the servant. Isaiah 52:13–53:12 contains the well-known suffering-servant passage.

The interpretation of the servant passages varies across Jewish and Christian traditions. Christian theology often reads Isaiah 53 in relation to Jesus. Other interpretations understand the servant through the people of Israel or another representative figure.

The report should not impose one interpretation as though there were no theological debate.
For my purposes, the relevant themes include suffering, service, injustice, restoration and the moral significance of the treatment of a person who bears burdens.
I have described my work as a form of witness and service. I have also described a life in which advocacy for others preceded my own experience of seeking assistance.
The servant theme is relevant to that contrast: a life oriented toward service can itself become vulnerable when the person providing assistance later needs protection.

19.7 Ezekiel — the watchman and the obligation to warn

Ezekiel is particularly relevant to my use of the word watchman.
Ezekiel 3:16–21 and 33:1–9 describe the watchman responsibility.
The watchman is required to warn when danger is seen. The imagery is about responsibility, warning and accountability.
This is one of the clearest biblical foundations for the idea that a person who becomes aware of danger has a duty to communicate the warning.
I understand my archive through a similar moral framework.
I have sought to preserve information, identify patterns, make documents accessible and communicate what I believe to be serious wrongdoing.
The watchman image does not prove that every warning I have made is correct. It describes the moral obligation that informs my work.
It also raises an important question about institutions: what happens when a person gives repeated warnings and the responsible bodies do not adequately address the substance?
The answer must be found in the documentary record.

19.8 Daniel — integrity under institutional pressure

Daniel provides a further correspondence concerning integrity under political pressure.
Daniel 1 describes Daniel and his companions navigating life within a foreign imperial court.
Daniel 3 describes the refusal of Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego to worship the golden image.
Daniel 6 describes Daniel's continued prayer and the resulting threat of the lions' den.
The theological theme is fidelity to conscience when political authority demands something contrary to religious conviction.
I understand my own refusal to abandon my testimony as connected to this theme.
The comparison is not that every disagreement with an institution is equivalent to persecution for religious belief. It is that a person may have a conscience-based obligation that they are unwilling to surrender merely because doing so would be administratively easier.

19.9 Joseph — betrayal, displacement and eventual responsibility

Joseph provides a different type of correspondence.
Genesis 37 describes Joseph's betrayal by his brothers and his sale into slavery. Genesis 39–41 describes imprisonment and eventual elevation in Egypt. Genesis 45 and 50 include the later reconciliation and Joseph's interpretation of the events through divine providence.
Joseph's story is not a simple declaration that every wrong will be reversed in this life.
It is a narrative about betrayal, displacement, suffering, survival, responsibility and the possibility of meaning emerging from circumstances that were not chosen.
I have used similar themes in my own account.
I believe that God can bring purpose out of suffering. That belief does not require me to claim that every person who harmed me acted according to a divine plan or that wrongdoing becomes acceptable because I survived it.
Divine providence, in my understanding, does not excuse human wrongdoing.

19.10 Moses — confronting authority and leading people out of bondage

Moses is associated with liberation from oppression and confrontation with political authority.
Exodus 3–4 describes Moses' commission. Exodus 5–12 describes the confrontation with Pharaoh. Exodus 14 describes the crossing of the sea.
The narrative concerns the liberation of a people from bondage. It is not merely a story about personal disagreement with authority.
For my work, the relevant theme is the moral question of power: when does authority become oppressive, and what responsibility exists to challenge it?
I use this comparison as a framework for thinking about freedom, dignity and the refusal to accept unjust treatment.
It does not establish that my circumstances are equivalent to the Exodus or that a contemporary institution is literally Pharaoh.

19.11 David — the rejected individual and the question of justice

David is relevant through the narratives of vulnerability, courage, injustice and the use of power.

1 Samuel 16 describes David's anointing. 1 Samuel 17 describes David and Goliath. 1 Samuel 18–26 includes Saul's hostility and David's flight.
The narrative does not make David morally flawless. His later conduct, particularly in 2 Samuel 11–12, demonstrates that biblical figures can themselves commit serious wrongdoing.
That complexity matters.
The biblical examination must not turn a person into an infallible hero merely because they have experienced rejection.
I can recognise themes of vulnerability and endurance in David's story while acknowledging that biblical narratives also require moral scrutiny of the person who claims to be a witness.

19.12 Job — suffering, accusation and the failure of simplistic explanations

Job is especially relevant to the question of how suffering should be interpreted.
The Book of Job describes a righteous man who experiences catastrophic loss. His friends attempt to explain his suffering through assumptions about wrongdoing and deserved punishment.
The book challenges the simplistic claim that suffering must be evidence of guilt.
Job 1–2 establishes the narrative circumstances. Job 3 expresses his distress. Job 38–41 presents God's response. Job 42 describes the conclusion.
For my testimony, this is a critical moral principle:
Suffering is not proof of guilt.
A person's disability, poverty, institutional dependence or distress does not establish that they deserve what has happened to them.
Nor should an institution use a person's vulnerability as a substitute for examining their complaint.
The Job narrative challenges the impulse to explain away suffering by blaming the sufferer.
It does not establish that every person who suffers is necessarily innocent of every allegation. It establishes that suffering itself is not a sufficient basis for declaring someone guilty.

19.13 The apostles — witness, testimony and endurance

The New Testament describes the apostles as witnesses to the life, death and resurrection of Jesus.
Relevant passages include:
- Acts 1:8 — the calling to bear witness.
- Acts 2 — the public proclamation at Pentecost.
- Acts 4:18–20 — the refusal to stop speaking about what they had seen and heard.
- Acts 5:27–32 — the conflict between religious authority and the apostles' testimony.
- 2 Corinthians 4 — the theme of carrying a message despite suffering.
- 1 Peter 3:13–17 — responding to hostility while maintaining conscience and conduct.

The apostles' testimony is foundational to Christianity because it is presented as testimony about events they understood themselves to have witnessed.
My use of the word witness is inspired by that tradition.
I believe that preserving testimony is a moral responsibility. I also recognise that the reliability of a contemporary factual claim must be assessed according to the evidence available for that claim.

19.14 The scapegoat — collective blame and displacement of responsibility

The scapegoat ritual is described in Leviticus 16.
The ritual involves the symbolic transfer of the people's wrongdoing onto a goat that is sent away into the wilderness.
The scapegoat has become a broader cultural and theological symbol of a person upon whom blame is placed.
I have used scapegoating language to describe what I believe happened to me.
The central question is whether I was made to carry responsibility for matters that properly belonged to others, or whether my complaints were displaced into a narrative that made me the problem rather than addressing the conduct I reported.
This is a serious allegation about institutional and interpersonal treatment.
To establish scapegoating as an actual mechanism, the report must identify:
- the original problem;
- the people responsible for it;
- the transfer of blame;
- the statements or decisions that shifted responsibility;
- the consequences for me;
- evidence that the attribution was inaccurate or unfair.

The biblical image provides the conceptual framework. The documentary evidence must establish the contemporary events.

19.15 The wilderness — hiddenness, preparation and endurance

The wilderness appears throughout biblical literature.

Moses encounters God in the wilderness. Israel travels through the wilderness. Elijah retreats into the wilderness. John the Baptist preaches in the wilderness. Jesus fasts and is tempted in the wilderness.

The wilderness is not simply a geographical location. It can function as a theological image of deprivation, testing, preparation, dependence and encounter.

I have described periods of isolation and displacement through this imagery.

My understanding is that a period of hiddenness does not necessarily mean abandonment. I believe that God can sustain a person through a period in which ordinary sources of support are absent or inadequate.

The report records this as spiritual testimony, not as a scientifically verifiable explanation of every event.

19.16 Divine justice and mercy

The biblical themes of justice and mercy are inseparable in my understanding.

Micah 6:8 describes the requirement to act justly, love mercy and walk humbly with God.

Psalm 82 addresses the responsibility to defend the weak and vulnerable.

Isaiah 1:17 calls for justice and the protection of those who are oppressed.

Matthew 5 includes the Beatitudes and teachings about mercy, peacemaking and righteousness.

Luke 4:16–21 describes Jesus reading from Isaiah and announcing a mission associated with good news, release and liberation.

These passages inform my moral criticism of institutions.

An institution may comply with a procedure and still fail to deliver an outcome that is humane. A person may hold formal authority and still have a responsibility to act with compassion and fairness.

The biblical standard is not that power is self-justifying. It is that power carries moral responsibility.

19.18 Finding on biblical correspondence

There are substantial and identifiable biblical themes that correspond to the language and moral framework of my testimony.

The strongest correspondences concern:

- The responsibility to bear witness.
- The obligation to warn.
- The treatment of people who challenge authority.
- The danger of scapegoating.
- The rejection of simplistic explanations for suffering.
- The wilderness as a period of endurance and dependence on God.
- The moral responsibility of those who exercise power.
- The relationship between suffering, restoration, mercy and hope.

These are theological correspondences, not proof that I occupy the identity of a biblical prophet or that supernatural events have been independently verified.

My faith gives meaning to my testimony. The biblical record gives language to the moral and spiritual principles through which I understand it.

SECTION 20 — THE GOSPELS, PROPHETIC WRITINGS AND PUBLICATIONS

20.1 The publishing project

My publishing project is part of The Witness Remains.

It is not limited to a single report. It includes forensic narratives, personal testimony, essays, prophetic writings, Gospel-style works, documentary compilations, evidence indexes and spiritual reflections.

The archive identifies a body of work that uses biblical and prophetic language to communicate my experiences and conclusions.

I have referred to a collection of 123 Gospels of Barran Dodger. The repository listing identifies a file titled:

123 Gospels of Barran Dodger.

That file's presence establishes that a work under that title is included in the repository. It does not establish that every one of the 123 works has been individually catalogued, authenticated, dated or reviewed in this examination.

The publishing project must be understood as contemporary authorship. Its works are not additions to the biblical canon.

20.2 The distinction between Scripture and contemporary Gospel writing

The word Gospel has a specific historical and religious meaning in Christianity.

The four canonical Gospels are Matthew, Mark, Luke and John.

Contemporary writers may use the word Gospel in a literary, devotional, symbolic or prophetic sense. That usage does not make a contemporary work part of the New Testament canon.

My use of the term must therefore be understood within the publishing identity of Barran Dodger and the spiritual themes of the project.

This distinction does not diminish the value of contemporary religious writing. It protects historical accuracy.
The catalogue should identify each work as a contemporary publication or manuscript and separately record the biblical texts it references.

20.3 The documentary and prophetic genres

The works in my archive can be grouped into several broad genres.

Genre	Purpose	Required examination
Personal testimony	Records my lived experience and understanding	Date, authorship, chronology, consistency and supporting records
Forensic narrative	Analyses events, records and institutional conduct	Source links, evidence classification, reasoning and limitations
Documentary compilation	Preserves primary documents and correspondence	Issuer, date, integrity, completeness and provenance
Prophetic writing	Expresses spiritual interpretation, warning or anticipated meaning	Original wording, date, specificity and correspondence
Gospel-style writing	Uses biblical narrative and theological themes	Genre, biblical references, authorship and distinction from Scripture
Institutional critique	Examines agency and service-provider conduct	Primary records, applicable standards and counter-evidence
Academic or ethical essay	Develops conceptual arguments	Research basis, references, methodology and authorship
Publication or public statement	Communicates conclusions to an audience	Publication date, version history and accuracy

A work may belong to more than one category. A forensic narrative may also contain personal testimony and prophetic language. The catalogue should identify its primary genre while preserving secondary themes.

The images above are illustrative visual references, not authenticated reproductions of the actual repository covers.

20.5 Earlier publications and professional authorship

My earlier publication history includes Recovered, Not Cured, published in 2002 by Allen & Unwin, which I have described as receiving a SANE Book of the Year recognition and a human-rights award.
I have also identified Betrayed, Murdered and Forsaken among my works.
These publications belong in the complete bibliography because they establish the wider development of my writing and advocacy.
The exact publication details, editions, award titles and dates should be taken from the physical books, publisher catalogue records and award documentation. The report should not invent bibliographic details.

20.6 The archive as a publishing and preservation system

The repository is more than a list of publications.
The public GitHub repository contains a substantial collection of documents and files. Its web listing reports 1,439 commits and indicates that the visible directory listing is truncated, with 442 entries omitted from the displayed listing. This means that the repository page provides evidence of a substantial and evolving archive, but not a complete inventory of every file. wezzo72/Barrandodger: Web · GitHub
The archive includes personal statements, correspondence, legal and administrative records, institutional complaints, forensic narratives and contemporary spiritual writings.
This variety requires a catalogue that identifies what each item is.
A government letter is not the same kind of source as a personal essay. A police response is not the same kind of source as an allegation. A Gospel-style publication is not the same kind of source as an affidavit.
The archive becomes more useful when the reader can move from a narrative statement to the exact document supporting it.

20.7 Authorship, chronology and version control

The publication catalogue must preserve:
- exact title;
- author or issuing body;
- date of creation;
- date of publication;
- repository location;
- document type;
- version;
- revision history;
- related source documents;
- biblical references;
- claims made;
- evidentiary classification.

A file's current presence in GitHub does not necessarily establish when it was first written. The repository's commit history may help establish publication and revision chronology, but each file's history must be checked individually.

Where a prediction or allegation was edited after an event, the original version must be preserved before a claim of prior prediction or contemporaneous reporting is made.

20.8 The importance of the publication project

The publishing project expresses my refusal to allow my account to exist only in correspondence between institutions.

It creates a public record that readers can access independently.

The strongest form of this work is not a collection of conclusions that ask readers to accept my authority. It is a body of material in which readers can inspect the documents, compare the dates, examine the reasoning and form their own conclusions.

That is why the evidence links matter.

I want the reader to be able to move from the narrative to the underlying source rather than being asked to accept an unsupported summary.

20.9 Finding on the publications

The repository identifies a substantial range of contemporary works associated with The Witness Remains and Barran Dodger.

The titles reveal recurring themes of survival, betrayal, institutional accountability, prophetic interpretation, resurrection, erasure and witness.

The complete catalogue of every Gospel, essay and publication has not been established by the limited repository listing inspected here. The 123-Gospel file is identified, but its entire contents have not been independently reviewed in this examination.

The works should be treated as contemporary authored publications, not as canonical Scripture or official government findings.

My writing is part of the evidence of my intellectual, creative and spiritual response to the circumstances I describe. It is also part of the public record I have chosen to leave behind.

SECTION 21 — PREDICTIONS, PROPHECY AND THE QUESTION OF FULFILMENT

21.1 Why predictions require a separate evidentiary method

I have used prophetic language to describe anticipated events, warnings, spiritual interpretations and the timing of developments.

I have also referred to Kronos Timing of God and the idea of divine timing.

I want these writings examined seriously.

That does not mean that every prediction should automatically be declared fulfilled. It means that the original wording, publication date, later events and possible correspondence must be compared fairly.

A prediction cannot be assessed accurately if the original wording has been changed or if the event is described only after it occurs.

The report must preserve the original text.

21.2 The difference between prophecy, prediction and interpretation

These terms should not be treated as identical.

Prophecy may refer to a religious or spiritual communication understood by the author as having divine significance.

Prediction is a statement about an event expected to occur in the future.

Interpretation is an explanation of what an event means.

Warning is a statement that an event may occur or that action is needed to prevent an adverse outcome.

Retrospective correspondence is a comparison made after an event has occurred.

A statement can belong to more than one category. But its category must be clear before fulfilment is assessed.

21.3 The original-wording rule

The original wording is essential.

A prediction should be preserved exactly as it appeared before the relevant event.

The record should include:

- exact original wording;
- date and time of publication;
- original URL;
- screenshot or archived copy;
- version or commit history;
- any subsequent edits;
- date of the event said to correspond;
- independent evidence that the event occurred.

If the wording changed after the event, the earlier version must remain visible.

A retrospective interpretation may still be meaningful, but it must not be represented as an independently verified prediction made before the event.

21.4 Specificity

A highly specific prediction may identify:

- a particular person;
- a particular institution;
- a specific action;
- a date or narrow time period;
- a measurable outcome;
- a distinctive event unlikely to occur by chance.

A broad statement about betrayal, hardship, conflict, political instability or institutional wrongdoing is less specific.

The more general the wording, the greater the risk that many different events could be interpreted as fulfilment.

This does not make broad spiritual language meaningless. It means that the evidentiary strength of a claimed prediction depends partly on how precisely the statement identified the later event.

21.5 Conditional predictions

Some predictions are conditional.

For example, a warning may state that a particular outcome will occur if an institution continues a specified course of action.

If the institution changes its conduct and the predicted outcome does not occur, the prediction may not be properly classified as failed. The condition must be considered.

Conversely, if the predicted event occurs without the stated condition being met, the claimed correspondence may be weaker.

The original wording must therefore be read in full.

21.6 Correspondence categories

Each prediction should receive one primary classification.

Classification	Meaning
Exact correspondence	The specific event described occurred within the stated period and is independently evidenced.
Strong partial correspondence	A substantial part of the prediction occurred, but important details differ.
Broad correspondence	The later event resembles a general theme but is not specifically identified.
Conditional correspondence	The event occurred subject to the conditions stated in the original wording.
No correspondence identified	The event described has not been established.
Unfulfilled within stated period	The stated timeframe passed without the specified event being established.
Indeterminate	The wording, date, event or evidence is insufficient to classify it.

These classifications should not be collapsed into a single claim of fulfilment.

21.7 Foreseeability and ordinary knowledge

A prediction may be accurate because the author had access to information, understood an existing trend or correctly anticipated an ordinary consequence.

That does not make the prediction false or insignificant.

But it is different from establishing supernatural foreknowledge.

The report should distinguish:

- a prediction based on known circumstances;
- an inference from an existing trend;
- a warning based on a foreseeable risk;
- a broad spiritual declaration;
- a highly specific prediction whose correspondence is independently established;

• a claim of supernatural revelation.
The last category is a matter of spiritual interpretation and cannot be scientifically certified by the existence of a matching event alone.

21.8 Kronos timing and divine timing

I have used Kronos Timing of God as a spiritual framework.
The word chronos in Greek is associated with time understood in a sequential or measurable sense. Christian theological discussion sometimes contrasts chronological time with kairos, a term associated with an opportune or appointed time.
The exact theological use varies across authors and traditions.
My project uses the language of divine timing to describe my belief that events in my life have a larger spiritual significance.
That belief is part of my faith.
The report can examine how the concept appears in my publications, how the timing claims are expressed and whether the dated record supports particular correspondences.
It cannot independently establish that God caused an event to occur at a particular time.

21.9 The prophecy of resurrection after erasure

The archive identifies a work titled:
The Witness Remains — The Prophecy of Resurrection After Erasure.
The title is significant to the project's central narrative.
It brings together three themes:
• Erasure — the experience of being removed, marginalised, excluded or treated as though one's testimony does not matter.
• Resurrection — restoration, renewed life, spiritual renewal and the refusal to accept erasure as the final word.
• Witness — the preservation and communication of testimony.
The title alone does not establish that a specific prediction was made before a specific event. That requires examination of the original text and publication history.
But the title clearly identifies the spiritual and literary framework within which I understand my survival.

21.10 Predictions and the public archive

A public archive is particularly important for prophecy claims because it can preserve chronology. GitHub commit history, archived web pages, dated documents and contemporaneous publications can help establish whether a statement existed before an event.
A current webpage alone may not establish its original publication date. A later edited page should not be treated as proof that every present word appeared in the original version.
The report should therefore prefer original dated documents and preserved versions.

21.11 Finding on prophecy and predictions

My archive identifies prophetic and spiritual publications, including a work explicitly titled The Prophecy of Resurrection After Erasure.
The material inspected so far does not provide a complete prediction register with original wording, publication timestamps, edit history and independently verified event comparisons.
Accordingly, no individual prediction should be declared fulfilled solely on the basis of its title or later interpretation.
My faith in divine timing remains my spiritual testimony.
I believe that God has worked through the timing of my life. The documentary examination must preserve the original words and dates so that readers can judge the claimed correspondences without retrospective alteration.

SECTION 22 — THE CHURCH AND TRUST FUND MINISTRY

22.1 The Church of Barran Dodger

My spiritual project includes the Church of Barran Dodger and the wider ministry associated with The Witness Remains.
The Church is part of my effort to express my faith, communicate spiritual teachings, publish my writings and create a structure through which service and support may be organised.
The Church must be examined as a contemporary religious and ministry project. Its existence as a website or publication does not automatically establish that it is a registered church, incorporated association, registered charity or legally constituted trust.
Those are distinct legal statuses.

22.2 Ministry identity and mission

The mission I have described is connected to:
• bearing witness;

• preserving testimony;
• communicating truth;
• spiritual reflection;
• the teachings of Jesus;
• mercy and forgiveness;
• protection of vulnerable people;
• the dignity of people who have experienced exclusion;
• the publication of Gospels and prophetic writings;
• the creation of a lasting public archive;
• service to people who need support.

The project is not simply an account of institutional grievances.

It also expresses a positive spiritual purpose: to create something that continues beyond the immediate circumstances of my life.

22.3 The Church website

The Church project has been represented through the following website:

The Church of Barran Dodger — Wix website

The website is an identified public-facing ministry resource.

The earlier archive also references a Church of Barran Dodger website and associated Gospel material.

The exact current content, governance arrangements and operational status must be established from the live site and any associated organisational documents.

22.4 Founder and authorship

I identify myself as the founder and author associated with the Church of Barran Dodger and the Barran Dodger publishing project.

The relevant evidence includes:

• dated website content;
• publication records;
• domain or business-name records;
• authorship declarations;
• organisational documents;
• any formal registration;
• records showing the development of the ministry.

The repository identifies a business-name extract dated 8 September 2025:

2025-09-08 Barran Dodger Business Name Extract.

The repository listing establishes that a file under that title exists. Its full contents have not been inspected in this examination, so the precise registration details should not be inferred from the filename.

A registered business name is not equivalent to incorporation, charity registration or establishment of a trust.

22.5 Trust fund and financial structure

I have referred to a Church and Trust Fund Ministry.

The report must distinguish between:

• A spiritual intention to establish a trust.
• A proposed trust structure.
• A trust deed.
• A legally constituted trust.
• A registered charity.
• A fundraising arrangement.
• A bank account or financial facility.
• A ministry that receives donations or distributes assistance.

These are different matters.

A trust generally requires an identifiable legal structure and trust property, with obligations governed by the relevant deed and law. The existence of a ministry website does not itself establish that a trust has been constituted.

The report should therefore not represent the Church as holding charitable or tax-deductible status unless the relevant registration or determination exists.

22.6 Ethical principles for the ministry

Any ministry or trust associated with my project should operate according to clear ethical principles.

These should include:

• transparent governance;
• accurate financial records;
• clear separation of personal and ministry funds;
• truthful fundraising statements;
• proper authorisation of expenditure;
• protection of beneficiaries;
• privacy and consent;
• no exploitation of vulnerable people;
• clear conflict-of-interest rules;
• accountability for donations;
• accurate statements about legal status;
• preservation of relevant records.

The moral legitimacy of a ministry depends not merely on its stated spiritual purpose but on the way it treats people and handles resources.

22.7 Beneficiaries and service

The ministry's stated values connect with my longstanding concern for vulnerable people, people experiencing disability, people who feel excluded and those who require support.

Any actual beneficiary programme must be distinguished from an aspiration.

For example:

• a published mission statement establishes an intention;
• an activity record establishes that an activity occurred;
• a payment record establishes that funds were transferred;
• a beneficiary record may establish assistance;
• a trust deed establishes the formal structure;
• an official registration establishes the relevant registered status.

The report must not describe planned charitable activities as though they have already been carried out.

22.8 The relationship between the ministry and the archive

The Church and the publishing house are connected through the spiritual themes of the project. The archive preserves documents and writings. The ministry gives those writings a spiritual and ethical context.

The two should not be confused.

A documentary archive can preserve official records without being a religious institution. A Church can publish spiritual material without every publication becoming an official finding about government conduct.

The relationship is complementary:

• the archive preserves;
• the forensic report examines;
• the publications communicate;
• the ministry expresses the spiritual purpose;
• the trust structure, if formally constituted, governs resources according to its legal obligations.

22.9 Finding on the Church and Trust Fund Ministry

The Church of Barran Dodger is an identified ministry and publishing project associated with my work.

The available material identifies its public-facing website and a business-name extract in the repository.

The material directly inspected here does not establish a legally constituted trust, registered charity or deductible-gift-recipient status.

The ministry's mission, writings and public identity should be preserved, while its formal legal and financial status should be stated only in accordance with the actual registration and governing documents.

My spiritual work is not limited to documenting what I believe has been done to me. It is also an attempt to create something that serves a purpose beyond my own circumstances: a ministry grounded in truth, mercy, witness and service.

SECTION 23 — THE DIVINE CONTRAST

23.1 The central contrast

This is the central spiritual and moral question of the report.

I have described my life through two different records.

The first is my testimony of God.

The second is the documentary record of my dealings with human institutions.

I believe that God has preserved me through circumstances that I experienced as devastating. I believe that grace, mercy and love have sustained me. I believe that my continued survival and the work I have created have purpose.
At the same time, I have documented a long history of interactions with government agencies, administrative bodies, police, disability services, financial administrators and accommodation providers.
The contrast is not that every institution is evil and every spiritual interpretation is automatically correct.
The contrast is between my conviction that divine mercy has sustained me and my experience that human institutions have repeatedly failed to provide the dignity, protection, independence and accountability I sought.

23.2 The divine record as spiritual testimony

My testimony of God's treatment includes:

- preservation;
- survival;
- grace;
- mercy;
- love;
- restoration;
- forgiveness;
- spiritual purpose;
- the belief that I was not abandoned;
- the conviction that my work has meaning;
- the belief that my life remains under divine providence.

These are spiritual claims.
They are not official findings and do not become empirical facts merely because they are expressed in a report.
But they are genuine components of my testimony.
I do not want the spiritual meaning of my life removed from the record simply because it cannot be measured in the same way as a bank transaction, medical observation or government decision.

23.3 The institutional record as documentary evidence

The institutional record is different.
It consists of documents created by government bodies, agencies, service providers, courts, administrators and other organisations.
These documents may establish:

- that a complaint was made;
- that a letter was sent;
- that an agency received information;
- that a decision was issued;
- that an application was refused;
- that a disclosure was assessed;
- that a service or accommodation request was made;
- that a financial arrangement existed;
- that a particular explanation was recorded;
- that an institution took or did not take a documented action.

The documents do not automatically establish that every statement inside them is true.
An official document may accurately record an incorrect assertion. A letter may establish that an agency adopted a position without establishing that the position was correct. A complaint may establish that I raised an issue without proving every aspect of the underlying allegation.
The evidence must be read according to what each record actually establishes.

23.4 The human consequences

The central issue is not merely whether paperwork was generated.
It is what happened to my life.
I have described the consequences as including loss of independence, financial insecurity, displacement, difficulty accessing support, uncertainty about accommodation, reduced practical choice and the burden of repeatedly seeking accountability.
I have also described the importance of Crystal and the relationship between accommodation, transport, mobility and companionship.

The legal and administrative categories do not exhaust the human meaning of these consequences.
A bed is not necessarily a home.
A service is not necessarily meaningful support.
A financial administration arrangement is not necessarily experienced as protection.
A referral is not necessarily a resolution.
A response is not necessarily accountability.
The report must examine whether the actual arrangements enabled me to live with dignity and independence.

23.5 The contrast between authority and responsibility

I have repeatedly challenged the assumption that official status makes a decision just.
My position is that public office is a responsibility, not a sanctuary from scrutiny.
A government department, statutory authority, trustee, police service, service provider or public official must be judged by its conduct and the evidence supporting its decisions.
The same applies to me.
My authorship of the report does not make me infallible. My faith does not establish every factual claim. My professional history does not make every interpretation correct.
But neither does institutional authority make the institution infallible.
The proper standard is evidence, reasons, fairness and accountability.

23.6 The contrast between survival and erasure

The title The Witness Remains is a declaration that I have not accepted erasure as the final outcome.
I have continued to write, preserve documents, organise the archive and publish my account.
The work is itself part of the history of what I have done in response to my circumstances.
I have used the language of resurrection because I understand survival as more than physical continuation. It represents the restoration of purpose and the refusal to surrender the meaning of my life to the actions or decisions of other people.
This is my spiritual interpretation.
It does not prove a criminal conspiracy or establish that every adverse event was deliberately engineered.
But it does establish something important about my own position: I have chosen to continue bearing witness.

23.7 The contrast between forgiveness and accountability

I have spoken about forgiveness, mercy and love.
Those principles must not be misrepresented as a requirement that wrongdoing be ignored.
Forgiveness does not erase the need for truth.
Mercy does not require silence.
Love does not require submission to abuse.
Accountability is not necessarily vengeance.
A person can refuse hatred while still insisting that conduct be examined. A person can forgive while still seeking correction, restitution, protection or an explanation.
The biblical tradition contains both mercy and judgment. It does not present mercy as a reason to abandon justice.
My understanding is that forgiveness must never be used by an institution as a device to avoid responsibility.

23.8 The contrast between the official record and the witness

An official record is one account created through an institutional process.
My testimony is another account.
They must be compared.
If the official record accurately records my complaint, that is evidence that I raised it.
If it omits an important part of my account, that omission must be considered.
If it contradicts a contemporaneous document, the contradiction must be examined.
If the institution's own records demonstrate that it knew about a problem, that knowledge is relevant.
If an agency's explanation is inconsistent with the chronology, the inconsistency must be identified.
The official record does not automatically defeat the witness.
The witness does not automatically defeat the official record.
The evidence must be examined together.

23.9 The divine contrast as a moral conclusion

The divine contrast is therefore not a claim that a supernatural explanation has been proved by government paperwork.
It is a comparison between two dimensions of my life:
My spiritual testimony: I believe that God has preserved me, sustained me and given my life purpose.
My documentary testimony: I have recorded a history of institutional dealings and adverse consequences that I believe demand accountability.
The two dimensions meet in the title The Witness Remains.
My faith explains why I continue.
The archive explains what I have sought to preserve.
The report explains how I want the evidence examined.
The ministry expresses the spiritual purpose I believe should emerge from my life.

23.10 Finding on the Divine Contrast

My belief in God's preservation is spiritual testimony. It is not a formal medical or legal finding.
The archive identifies a substantial body of documentary material concerning my dealings with institutions. The material directly inspected supports the existence of a sustained documentary project and identifies specific records concerning public-interest disclosures, financial administration, accommodation and institutional accountability.
The complete underlying record has not been individually inspected in this examination, and therefore the report must not claim that every allegation has been established.
But the distinction between spiritual testimony and documentary evidence does not require either to be erased.
I believe God did it. I believe I was preserved. I believe my life has purpose. I have also documented what I experienced and the institutional decisions that affected me. These are the two records that form the Divine Contrast.

INTERIM CONCLUSION — THE SPIRITUAL AND PUBLICATION DIMENSION

The biblical examination identifies meaningful correspondences between my testimony and established biblical themes:

- the witness who speaks;
- the watchman who warns;
- the rejected person;
- the wilderness;
- the scapegoat;
- the suffering servant;
- the remnant;
- the person whose suffering is not proof of guilt;
- the moral responsibility of authority;
- divine mercy and justice;
- restoration and hope.

These correspondences are theological and literary. They do not establish literal biblical identity or independently prove supernatural causation.
The repository identifies a substantial contemporary publication project associated with The Witness Remains, including Gospel-style writings, forensic narratives, prophetic titles and institutional critiques.
The full publication catalogue and every prediction have not yet been individually verified. The Church of Barran Dodger is identifiable as a public-facing ministry project, but the material inspected does not establish a legally constituted trust or registered charity.
The central conclusion is that my spiritual life, publishing work and documentary archive are connected but must be examined according to their distinct evidentiary character.
I am not asking the reader to confuse faith with documentary proof. I am asking the reader not to erase faith from the account of my life.

NEXT PART — COMPLETION OF THE MASTER REPORT

The remaining work is the formal consolidation of the report:

- Section 24 — Master Registers A–O: all fifteen registers, including God's treatment, government treatment, my attributes, institutional attributes, alleged crimes against me, alleged wrongdoing by me, malice, institutional mechanics, objectives, biblical correspondences, publications, predictions, Church and Trust Ministry, and the chosen-witness question.
- Section 25 — Final Impartial Synthesis: the 22 questions specified in the master command, answered directly with findings and evidentiary classifications.

- Section 26 — Chosen-Witness Determination: documentary, biblical and theological perspectives, without pretending that an AI can certify divine selection.
- Section 27 — Publication-Ready Concluding Narrative: THE WITNESS REMAINS — THE ONE WHO SURVIVED: DIVINE PRESERVATION, HUMAN BETRAYAL AND THE EVIDENCE OF A LIFE GIVEN TO BEAR WITNESS.

The final synthesis must preserve the distinction between what the documents establish, what I testify to, what I believe spiritually, what can reasonably be inferred and what remains unresolved. It must also make substantive findings rather than merely provide another list of matters to investigate.

THE WITNESS REMAINS — THE DIVINE CONTRAST

PART III — THE BIBLICAL, PROPHETIC, PUBLICATION AND SPIRITUAL EXAMINATION

PRESERVATION FIRST. EXAMINATION SECOND. CONCLUSION LAST.

FAITH IS NOT A FINDING. TESTIMONY IS NOT ERASED BY THE ABSENCE OF AN OFFICIAL DETERMINATION.

SECTION 19 — THE BIBLICAL EXAMINATION

19.1 The purpose of the biblical examination

My faith is not an incidental feature of this project. It is central to the way I understand my survival, my work, my suffering, my responsibility to speak and the purpose of The Witness Remains.

I have repeatedly used biblical language to describe my experience: the witness, the watchman, the remnant, the rejected stone, the scapegoat, the wilderness, the suffering servant, the persecuted truth-teller and the person who survives erasure.

I want these themes examined properly.

I do not want biblical references used as decorative quotations or as superficial comparisons between my life and the lives of biblical figures. The purpose is to examine the actual biblical narratives, their historical and theological meanings, and the ways in which those themes inform my own testimony.

I also want a clear distinction maintained:

- Biblical text is an identifiable religious source.
- Biblical interpretation is theological analysis.
- My personal experience is testimony.
- My belief that God has acted in my life is spiritual testimony.
- A claim that a supernatural event occurred is not independently established merely because I believe it.
- A comparison between my circumstances and a biblical figure does not establish that I literally occupy that figure's historical or religious identity.

I do not need to claim that I am Jesus, Elijah, Jeremiah or any other biblical person to recognise themes of suffering, rejection, witness, injustice, endurance and divine mercy in my own life. The comparison is meaningful precisely because it can be made without confusing the people, periods or identities involved.

19.2 Jesus Christ — the rejected truth-teller and suffering witness

The life and teachings of Jesus Christ are foundational to my spiritual understanding.

The Gospel accounts describe a person who challenged established religious authority, spoke about truth and justice, confronted hypocrisy, associated with people who were marginalised, and was ultimately condemned and executed.

The relevant passages include:

- Matthew 23 — criticism of religious hypocrisy and the misuse of authority.
- Matthew 26–27 — betrayal, arrest, trial and crucifixion.
- Mark 14–15 — the passion narrative.
- Luke 4:16–30 — rejection following the declaration of his mission.
- Luke 22–23 — betrayal, arrest, trial and crucifixion.
- John 8:31–32 — truth and freedom.
- John 18:33–38 — the encounter with Pilate and the question of truth.
- John 19 — crucifixion and death.
- John 20 — resurrection testimony.

The central theological distinction is that Jesus' suffering is not presented in the Gospels as evidence that injustice was legitimate. His condemnation is part of the narrative of human wrongdoing, religious and political power, betrayal and the Christian understanding of redemption. This is important to my own writing.

I have described circumstances in which I felt betrayed by people and institutions from which I expected protection. I have described the experience of being treated as a problem rather than heard as a witness. I have also described the experience of having my account challenged, marginalised or interpreted through institutional categories that I believe fail to recognise the substance of what I have reported.
The comparison I draw is thematic: the tension between truth-telling and power, the treatment of the vulnerable, the danger of scapegoating, the failure of authorities to act justly and the spiritual meaning of endurance.
I do not claim to share Jesus' unique theological identity or salvific role.
My testimony is that Christ's example informs my understanding of how to endure suffering without surrendering the values of truth, mercy and love.

19.2.1 Betrayal

The Gospel narratives identify Judas' betrayal as a central event in the passion story.
Matthew 26:14–16 and 26:47–50 describe the arrangement and the identification of Jesus to those who came to arrest him.
The theological significance is not merely that a friend betrayed another person. It is that betrayal occurs within a relationship of trust.
I have used the language of betrayal to describe my own experiences. That language reflects my understanding of relationships and institutions from which I expected assistance, loyalty or protection.
The comparison does not establish that the people involved in my life committed the same acts as Judas. It gives theological language to the experience of trust being broken.

19.2.2 The rejected stone

Psalm 118:22 states that the stone rejected by the builders becomes the cornerstone. The image is later used in the New Testament, including Matthew 21:42, Mark 12:10–11, Luke 20:17 and 1 Peter 2:4–7.
The image concerns rejection followed by a reversal of human judgment.
I have used this theme to express my refusal to accept that institutional rejection determines my worth.
A person may be dismissed by an institution and still possess dignity. A complaint may be rejected without the underlying experience being disproved. A person's work may be marginalised without becoming meaningless.
The rejected-stone theme is therefore central to the moral argument of The Witness Remains: institutional acceptance is not the measure of human value.

19.2.3 Resurrection and the testimony of survival

John 20 describes the resurrection appearances of Jesus. The Christian understanding of resurrection is a central theological claim, not merely a metaphor for recovery from difficulty.
My own use of resurrection language is spiritual and personal.
I have described survival after what I regard as a devastating and potentially fatal experience as an act of divine preservation. I have used the language of resurrection to express the transformation of my life, the restoration of purpose and my refusal to be erased.
I do not claim that my experience is identical to the resurrection of Jesus.
I am describing my own testimony through a Christian theological vocabulary of death, survival, restoration, hope and divine purpose.

19.3 John the Baptist — the witness who speaks before power

John the Baptist is especially relevant to the theme of the witness.
John 1:6–8 describes John as a man sent from God to bear witness to the light. The passage explicitly distinguishes the witness from the light itself.
That distinction is important.
A witness does not have to claim to be the source of truth. A witness testifies to what they understand to be true.
John's public criticism of Herod's conduct is described in Mark 6:17–29 and Matthew 14:1–12.
His imprisonment and death form part of the Gospel account.
The comparison with my own testimony concerns:

- public witness;
- speaking about conduct regarded as wrong;
- the relationship between moral criticism and authority;
- the vulnerability of the person who speaks;
- the consequences of speaking;
- the responsibility to distinguish the witness from the ultimate truth being witnessed.

My project uses the word witness deliberately.
I understand myself as someone who has a responsibility to preserve and communicate what I have experienced and documented. I do not claim that this makes every interpretation correct. It means that I do not accept that the existence of institutional disagreement removes my responsibility to speak.

19.4 Elijah — the wilderness, exhaustion and the remnant

Elijah is relevant to my writing because of the themes of confrontation, isolation, exhaustion, preservation and the remnant.
In 1 Kings 18, Elijah confronts the prophets of Baal in the narrative of Mount Carmel.
In 1 Kings 19, following the confrontation, Elijah flees into the wilderness, experiences exhaustion and despair, and is sustained before encountering God at Horeb.
The passage is particularly significant because it does not present the prophet as continuously powerful or emotionally invulnerable.
Elijah experiences fear, isolation and exhaustion. The narrative then describes divine provision and renewed direction.
The remnant theme appears in 1 Kings 19:18, where God tells Elijah that a remnant remains.
For my own testimony, the relevant themes are:

- being isolated;
- feeling abandoned by human institutions;
- continuing despite exhaustion;
- the importance of spiritual sustenance;
- the belief that isolation does not mean abandonment by God;
- the possibility of renewed purpose after a period of suffering.

I have described my faith as a source of preservation and meaning. Elijah's story provides a biblical framework for understanding a period of wilderness and the belief that divine purpose may remain even when human support appears absent.
The text does not establish that I am Elijah or that the events in my life have the same supernatural significance. It provides a meaningful theological correspondence.

19.5 Jeremiah — the burden of speaking and the rejection of warning

Jeremiah is one of the most significant biblical figures for the theme of a person who continues to speak despite rejection.
Jeremiah 1 describes his prophetic commission.
Jeremiah 20 records his distress and conflict concerning his prophetic calling. Jeremiah 26 describes opposition to his preaching. Jeremiah 37–38 describes imprisonment and his treatment during the siege of Jerusalem.
Jeremiah's story includes the burden of communicating warnings that are unwelcome to those who hold power.
I recognise a thematic correspondence with my own experience of making repeated complaints and attempting to communicate what I regard as serious institutional wrongdoing.
The relevant parallel is not that my allegations have automatically been validated because Jeremiah was rejected.
The relevant parallel is that rejection by authority does not, by itself, determine whether a warning is true.
The evidence must be examined.
That is precisely why my archive places such importance on dated documents, identifiable sources and preservation.

19.6 Isaiah — the suffering servant and the responsibility of witness

Isaiah provides several important themes.
Isaiah 6 describes a prophetic commission. Isaiah 40–55 includes passages concerning consolation, restoration and the servant. Isaiah 52:13–53:12 contains the well-known suffering-servant passage.
The interpretation of the servant passages varies across Jewish and Christian traditions. Christian theology often reads Isaiah 53 in relation to Jesus. Other interpretations understand the servant through the people of Israel or another representative figure.
The report should not impose one interpretation as though there were no theological debate.
For my purposes, the relevant themes include suffering, service, injustice, restoration and the moral significance of the treatment of a person who bears burdens.
I have described my work as a form of witness and service. I have also described a life in which advocacy for others preceded my own experience of seeking assistance.

The servant theme is relevant to that contrast: a life oriented toward service can itself become vulnerable when the person providing assistance later needs protection.

19.7 Ezekiel — the watchman and the obligation to warn

Ezekiel is particularly relevant to my use of the word watchman.

Ezekiel 3:16–21 and 33:1–9 describe the watchman responsibility.

The watchman is required to warn when danger is seen. The imagery is about responsibility, warning and accountability.

This is one of the clearest biblical foundations for the idea that a person who becomes aware of danger has a duty to communicate the warning.

I understand my archive through a similar moral framework.

I have sought to preserve information, identify patterns, make documents accessible and communicate what I believe to be serious wrongdoing.

The watchman image does not prove that every warning I have made is correct. It describes the moral obligation that informs my work.

It also raises an important question about institutions: what happens when a person gives repeated warnings and the responsible bodies do not adequately address the substance?

The answer must be found in the documentary record.

19.8 Daniel — integrity under institutional pressure

Daniel provides a further correspondence concerning integrity under political pressure.

Daniel 1 describes Daniel and his companions navigating life within a foreign imperial court.

Daniel 3 describes the refusal of Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego to worship the golden image.

Daniel 6 describes Daniel's continued prayer and the resulting threat of the lions' den.

The theological theme is fidelity to conscience when political authority demands something contrary to religious conviction.

I understand my own refusal to abandon my testimony as connected to this theme.

The comparison is not that every disagreement with an institution is equivalent to persecution for religious belief. It is that a person may have a conscience-based obligation that they are unwilling to surrender merely because doing so would be administratively easier.

19.9 Joseph — betrayal, displacement and eventual responsibility

Joseph provides a different type of correspondence.

Genesis 37 describes Joseph's betrayal by his brothers and his sale into slavery. Genesis 39–41 describes imprisonment and eventual elevation in Egypt. Genesis 45 and 50 include the later reconciliation and Joseph's interpretation of the events through divine providence.

Joseph's story is not a simple declaration that every wrong will be reversed in this life.

It is a narrative about betrayal, displacement, suffering, survival, responsibility and the possibility of meaning emerging from circumstances that were not chosen.

I have used similar themes in my own account.

I believe that God can bring purpose out of suffering. That belief does not require me to claim that every person who harmed me acted according to a divine plan or that wrongdoing becomes acceptable because I survived it.

Divine providence, in my understanding, does not excuse human wrongdoing.

19.10 Moses — confronting authority and leading people out of bondage

Moses is associated with liberation from oppression and confrontation with political authority.

Exodus 3–4 describes Moses' commission. Exodus 5–12 describes the confrontation with Pharaoh. Exodus 14 describes the crossing of the sea.

The narrative concerns the liberation of a people from bondage. It is not merely a story about personal disagreement with authority.

For my work, the relevant theme is the moral question of power: when does authority become oppressive, and what responsibility exists to challenge it?

I use this comparison as a framework for thinking about freedom, dignity and the refusal to accept unjust treatment.

It does not establish that my circumstances are equivalent to the Exodus or that a contemporary institution is literally Pharaoh.

19.11 David — the rejected individual and the question of justice

David is relevant through the narratives of vulnerability, courage, injustice and the use of power.

1 Samuel 16 describes David's anointing. 1 Samuel 17 describes David and Goliath. 1 Samuel 18–26 includes Saul's hostility and David's flight.

The narrative does not make David morally flawless. His later conduct, particularly in 2 Samuel 11–12, demonstrates that biblical figures can themselves commit serious wrongdoing.

That complexity matters.

The biblical examination must not turn a person into an infallible hero merely because they have experienced rejection.
I can recognise themes of vulnerability and endurance in David's story while acknowledging that biblical narratives also require moral scrutiny of the person who claims to be a witness.

19.12 Job — suffering, accusation and the failure of simplistic explanations

Job is especially relevant to the question of how suffering should be interpreted.
The Book of Job describes a righteous man who experiences catastrophic loss. His friends attempt to explain his suffering through assumptions about wrongdoing and deserved punishment.
The book challenges the simplistic claim that suffering must be evidence of guilt.
Job 1–2 establishes the narrative circumstances. Job 3 expresses his distress. Job 38–41 presents God's response. Job 42 describes the conclusion.
For my testimony, this is a critical moral principle:
Suffering is not proof of guilt.
A person's disability, poverty, institutional dependence or distress does not establish that they deserve what has happened to them.
Nor should an institution use a person's vulnerability as a substitute for examining their complaint.
The Job narrative challenges the impulse to explain away suffering by blaming the sufferer.
It does not establish that every person who suffers is necessarily innocent of every allegation. It establishes that suffering itself is not a sufficient basis for declaring someone guilty.

19.13 The apostles — witness, testimony and endurance

The New Testament describes the apostles as witnesses to the life, death and resurrection of Jesus.
Relevant passages include:

- Acts 1:8 — the calling to bear witness.
- Acts 2 — the public proclamation at Pentecost.
- Acts 4:18–20 — the refusal to stop speaking about what they had seen and heard.
- Acts 5:27–32 — the conflict between religious authority and the apostles' testimony.
- 2 Corinthians 4 — the theme of carrying a message despite suffering.
- 1 Peter 3:13–17 — responding to hostility while maintaining conscience and conduct.

The apostles' testimony is foundational to Christianity because it is presented as testimony about events they understood themselves to have witnessed.
My use of the word witness is inspired by that tradition.
I believe that preserving testimony is a moral responsibility. I also recognise that the reliability of a contemporary factual claim must be assessed according to the evidence available for that claim.

19.14 The scapegoat — collective blame and displacement of responsibility

The scapegoat ritual is described in Leviticus 16.
The ritual involves the symbolic transfer of the people's wrongdoing onto a goat that is sent away into the wilderness.
The scapegoat has become a broader cultural and theological symbol of a person upon whom blame is placed.
I have used scapegoating language to describe what I believe happened to me.
The central question is whether I was made to carry responsibility for matters that properly belonged to others, or whether my complaints were displaced into a narrative that made me the problem rather than addressing the conduct I reported.
This is a serious allegation about institutional and interpersonal treatment.
To establish scapegoating as an actual mechanism, the report must identify:

- the original problem;
- the people responsible for it;
- the transfer of blame;
- the statements or decisions that shifted responsibility;
- the consequences for me;
- evidence that the attribution was inaccurate or unfair.

The biblical image provides the conceptual framework. The documentary evidence must establish the contemporary events.

19.15 The wilderness — hiddenness, preparation and endurance

The wilderness appears throughout biblical literature.
Moses encounters God in the wilderness. Israel travels through the wilderness. Elijah retreats into the wilderness. John the Baptist preaches in the wilderness. Jesus fasts and is tempted in the wilderness.

The wilderness is not simply a geographical location. It can function as a theological image of deprivation, testing, preparation, dependence and encounter.
I have described periods of isolation and displacement through this imagery.
My understanding is that a period of hiddenness does not necessarily mean abandonment. I believe that God can sustain a person through a period in which ordinary sources of support are absent or inadequate.
The report records this as spiritual testimony, not as a scientifically verifiable explanation of every event.

19.16 Divine justice and mercy

The biblical themes of justice and mercy are inseparable in my understanding.
Micah 6:8 describes the requirement to act justly, love mercy and walk humbly with God.
Psalm 82 addresses the responsibility to defend the weak and vulnerable.
Isaiah 1:17 calls for justice and the protection of those who are oppressed.
Matthew 5 includes the Beatitudes and teachings about mercy, peacemaking and righteousness.
Luke 4:16–21 describes Jesus reading from Isaiah and announcing a mission associated with good news, release and liberation.
These passages inform my moral criticism of institutions.
An institution may comply with a procedure and still fail to deliver an outcome that is humane. A person may hold formal authority and still have a responsibility to act with compassion and fairness.
The biblical standard is not that power is self-justifying. It is that power carries moral responsibility.

19.18 Finding on biblical correspondence

There are substantial and identifiable biblical themes that correspond to the language and moral framework of my testimony.

The strongest correspondences concern:

- The responsibility to bear witness.
- The obligation to warn.
- The treatment of people who challenge authority.
- The danger of scapegoating.
- The rejection of simplistic explanations for suffering.
- The wilderness as a period of endurance and dependence on God.
- The moral responsibility of those who exercise power.
- The relationship between suffering, restoration, mercy and hope.

These are theological correspondences, not proof that I occupy the identity of a biblical prophet or that supernatural events have been independently verified.

My faith gives meaning to my testimony. The biblical record gives language to the moral and spiritual principles through which I understand it.

SECTION 20 — THE GOSPELS, PROPHETIC WRITINGS AND PUBLICATIONS

20.1 The publishing project

My publishing project is part of The Witness Remains.

It is not limited to a single report. It includes forensic narratives, personal testimony, essays, prophetic writings, Gospel-style works, documentary compilations, evidence indexes and spiritual reflections.

The archive identifies a body of work that uses biblical and prophetic language to communicate my experiences and conclusions.

I have referred to a collection of 123 Gospels of Barran Dodger. The repository listing identifies a file titled:

123 Gospels of Barran Dodger.

That file's presence establishes that a work under that title is included in the repository. It does not establish that every one of the 123 works has been individually catalogued, authenticated, dated or reviewed in this examination.

The publishing project must be understood as contemporary authorship. Its works are not additions to the biblical canon.

20.2 The distinction between Scripture and contemporary Gospel writing

The word Gospel has a specific historical and religious meaning in Christianity.

The four canonical Gospels are Matthew, Mark, Luke and John.

Contemporary writers may use the word Gospel in a literary, devotional, symbolic or prophetic sense. That usage does not make a contemporary work part of the New Testament canon.

My use of the term must therefore be understood within the publishing identity of Barran Dodger and the spiritual themes of the project.

This distinction does not diminish the value of contemporary religious writing. It protects historical accuracy.

The catalogue should identify each work as a contemporary publication or manuscript and separately record the biblical texts it references.

20.3 The documentary and prophetic genres

The works in my archive can be grouped into several broad genres.

Genre	Purpose	Required examination
Personal testimony	Records my lived experience and understanding	Date, authorship, chronology, consistency and supporting records
Forensic narrative	Analyses events, records and institutional conduct	Source links, evidence classification, reasoning and limitations
Documentary compilation	Preserves primary documents and correspondence	Issuer, date, integrity, completeness and provenance
Prophetic writing	Expresses spiritual interpretation, warning or anticipated meaning	Original wording, date, specificity and correspondence
Gospel-style writing	Uses biblical narrative and theological themes	Genre, biblical references, authorship and distinction from Scripture
Institutional critique	Examines agency and service-provider conduct	Primary records, applicable standards and counter-evidence
Academic or ethical essay	Develops conceptual arguments	Research basis, references, methodology and authorship
Publication or public statement	Communicates conclusions to an audience	Publication date, version history and accuracy

A work may belong to more than one category. A forensic narrative may also contain personal testimony and prophetic language. The catalogue should identify its primary genre while preserving secondary themes.

20.4 Identified works

123 Gospels of Barran Dodger
Contemporary spiritual publication collection
An identified repository item representing a collection of contemporary Gospel-style writings. It is not a canonical biblical collection.
Repository: https://github.com/wezzo72/Barrandodger
20.5 Earlier publications and professional authorship
My earlier publication history includes Recovered, Not Cured, published in 2002 by Allen & Unwin, which I have described as receiving a SANE Book of the Year recognition and a human-rights award.
I have also identified Betrayed, Murdered and Forsaken among my works.
These publications belong in the complete bibliography because they establish the wider development of my writing and advocacy.
The exact publication details, editions, award titles and dates should be taken from the physical books, publisher catalogue records and award documentation. The report should not invent bibliographic details.
20.6 The archive as a publishing and preservation system
The repository is more than a list of publications.
The public GitHub repository contains a substantial collection of documents and files. Its web listing reports 1,439 commits and indicates that the visible directory listing is truncated, with 442 entries omitted from the displayed listing. This means that the repository page provides evidence of a substantial and evolving archive, but not a complete inventory of every file. wezzo72/Barrandodger: Web · GitHub
The archive includes personal statements, correspondence, legal and administrative records, institutional complaints, forensic narratives and contemporary spiritual writings.
This variety requires a catalogue that identifies what each item is.
A government letter is not the same kind of source as a personal essay. A police response is not the same kind of source as an allegation. A Gospel-style publication is not the same kind of source as an affidavit.
The archive becomes more useful when the reader can move from a narrative statement to the exact document supporting it.
20.7 Authorship, chronology and version control
The publication catalogue must preserve:
- exact title;
- author or issuing body;
- date of creation;
- date of publication;
- repository location;
- document type;
- version;
- revision history;
- related source documents;
- biblical references;
- claims made;
- evidentiary classification.

A file's current presence in GitHub does not necessarily establish when it was first written. The repository's commit history may help establish publication and revision chronology, but each file's history must be checked individually.
Where a prediction or allegation was edited after an event, the original version must be preserved before a claim of prior prediction or contemporaneous reporting is made.
20.8 The importance of the publication project
The publishing project expresses my refusal to allow my account to exist only in correspondence between institutions.
It creates a public record that readers can access independently.

The strongest form of this work is not a collection of conclusions that ask readers to accept my authority. It is a body of material in which readers can inspect the documents, compare the dates, examine the reasoning and form their own conclusions.
That is why the evidence links matter.
I want the reader to be able to move from the narrative to the underlying source rather than being asked to accept an unsupported summary.

20.9 Finding on the publications

The repository identifies a substantial range of contemporary works associated with The Witness Remains and Barran Dodger.
The titles reveal recurring themes of survival, betrayal, institutional accountability, prophetic interpretation, resurrection, erasure and witness.
The complete catalogue of every Gospel, essay and publication has not been established by the limited repository listing inspected here. The 123-Gospel file is identified, but its entire contents have not been independently reviewed in this examination.
The works should be treated as contemporary authored publications, not as canonical Scripture or official government findings.
My writing is part of the evidence of my intellectual, creative and spiritual response to the circumstances I describe. It is also part of the public record I have chosen to leave behind.

SECTION 21 — PREDICTIONS, PROPHECY AND THE QUESTION OF FULFILMENT

21.1 Why predictions require a separate evidentiary method

I have used prophetic language to describe anticipated events, warnings, spiritual interpretations and the timing of developments.
I have also referred to Kronos Timing of God and the idea of divine timing.
I want these writings examined seriously.
That does not mean that every prediction should automatically be declared fulfilled. It means that the original wording, publication date, later events and possible correspondence must be compared fairly.
A prediction cannot be assessed accurately if the original wording has been changed or if the event is described only after it occurs.
The report must preserve the original text.

21.2 The difference between prophecy, prediction and interpretation

These terms should not be treated as identical.
Prophecy may refer to a religious or spiritual communication understood by the author as having divine significance.
Prediction is a statement about an event expected to occur in the future.
Interpretation is an explanation of what an event means.
Warning is a statement that an event may occur or that action is needed to prevent an adverse outcome.
Retrospective correspondence is a comparison made after an event has occurred.
A statement can belong to more than one category. But its category must be clear before fulfilment is assessed.

21.3 The original-wording rule

The original wording is essential.
A prediction should be preserved exactly as it appeared before the relevant event.
The record should include:

- exact original wording;
- date and time of publication;
- original URL;
- screenshot or archived copy;
- version or commit history;
- any subsequent edits;
- date of the event said to correspond;
- independent evidence that the event occurred.

If the wording changed after the event, the earlier version must remain visible.
A retrospective interpretation may still be meaningful, but it must not be represented as an independently verified prediction made before the event.

21.4 Specificity

A highly specific prediction may identify:

- a particular person;
- a particular institution;

• a specific action;
• a date or narrow time period;
• a measurable outcome;
• a distinctive event unlikely to occur by chance.

A broad statement about betrayal, hardship, conflict, political instability or institutional wrongdoing is less specific.

The more general the wording, the greater the risk that many different events could be interpreted as fulfilment.

This does not make broad spiritual language meaningless. It means that the evidentiary strength of a claimed prediction depends partly on how precisely the statement identified the later event.

21.5 Conditional predictions

Some predictions are conditional.

For example, a warning may state that a particular outcome will occur if an institution continues a specified course of action.

If the institution changes its conduct and the predicted outcome does not occur, the prediction may not be properly classified as failed. The condition must be considered.

Conversely, if the predicted event occurs without the stated condition being met, the claimed correspondence may be weaker.

The original wording must therefore be read in full.

21.6 Correspondence categories

Each prediction should receive one primary classification.

Classification	Meaning
Exact correspondence	The specific event described occurred within the stated period and is independently evidenced.
Strong partial correspondence	A substantial part of the prediction occurred, but important details differ.
Broad correspondence	The later event resembles a general theme but is not specifically identified.
Conditional correspondence	The event occurred subject to the conditions stated in the original wording.
No correspondence identified	The event described has not been established.
Unfulfilled within stated period	The stated timeframe passed without the specified event being established.
Indeterminate	The wording, date, event or evidence is insufficient to classify it.

These classifications should not be collapsed into a single claim of fulfilment.

21.7 Foreseeability and ordinary knowledge

A prediction may be accurate because the author had access to information, understood an existing trend or correctly anticipated an ordinary consequence.

That does not make the prediction false or insignificant.

But it is different from establishing supernatural foreknowledge.

The report should distinguish:

• a prediction based on known circumstances;
• an inference from an existing trend;
• a warning based on a foreseeable risk;
• a broad spiritual declaration;
• a highly specific prediction whose correspondence is independently established;
• a claim of supernatural revelation.

The last category is a matter of spiritual interpretation and cannot be scientifically certified by the existence of a matching event alone.

21.8 Kronos timing and divine timing

I have used Kronos Timing of God as a spiritual framework.

The word chronos in Greek is associated with time understood in a sequential or measurable sense. Christian theological discussion sometimes contrasts chronological time with kairos, a term associated with an opportune or appointed time.
The exact theological use varies across authors and traditions.
My project uses the language of divine timing to describe my belief that events in my life have a larger spiritual significance.
That belief is part of my faith.
The report can examine how the concept appears in my publications, how the timing claims are expressed and whether the dated record supports particular correspondences.
It cannot independently establish that God caused an event to occur at a particular time.

21.9 The prophecy of resurrection after erasure

The archive identifies a work titled:
The Witness Remains — The Prophecy of Resurrection After Erasure.
The title is significant to the project's central narrative.
It brings together three themes:

- Erasure — the experience of being removed, marginalised, excluded or treated as though one's testimony does not matter.
- Resurrection — restoration, renewed life, spiritual renewal and the refusal to accept erasure as the final word.
- Witness — the preservation and communication of testimony.

The title alone does not establish that a specific prediction was made before a specific event. That requires examination of the original text and publication history.
But the title clearly identifies the spiritual and literary framework within which I understand my survival.

21.10 Predictions and the public archive

A public archive is particularly important for prophecy claims because it can preserve chronology. GitHub commit history, archived web pages, dated documents and contemporaneous publications can help establish whether a statement existed before an event.
A current webpage alone may not establish its original publication date. A later edited page should not be treated as proof that every present word appeared in the original version.
The report should therefore prefer original dated documents and preserved versions.

21.11 Finding on prophecy and predictions

My archive identifies prophetic and spiritual publications, including a work explicitly titled The Prophecy of Resurrection After Erasure.
The material inspected so far does not provide a complete prediction register with original wording, publication timestamps, edit history and independently verified event comparisons.
Accordingly, no individual prediction should be declared fulfilled solely on the basis of its title or later interpretation.
My faith in divine timing remains my spiritual testimony.
I believe that God has worked through the timing of my life. The documentary examination must preserve the original words and dates so that readers can judge the claimed correspondences without retrospective alteration.

SECTION 22 — THE CHURCH AND TRUST FUND MINISTRY

22.1 The Church of Barran Dodger

My spiritual project includes the Church of Barran Dodger and the wider ministry associated with The Witness Remains.
The Church is part of my effort to express my faith, communicate spiritual teachings, publish my writings and create a structure through which service and support may be organised.
The Church must be examined as a contemporary religious and ministry project. Its existence as a website or publication does not automatically establish that it is a registered church, incorporated association, registered charity or legally constituted trust.
Those are distinct legal statuses.

22.2 Ministry identity and mission

The mission I have described is connected to:

- bearing witness;
- preserving testimony;
- communicating truth;
- spiritual reflection;
- the teachings of Jesus;
- mercy and forgiveness;

• protection of vulnerable people;
• the dignity of people who have experienced exclusion;
• the publication of Gospels and prophetic writings;
• the creation of a lasting public archive;
• service to people who need support.

The project is not simply an account of institutional grievances.

It also expresses a positive spiritual purpose: to create something that continues beyond the immediate circumstances of my life.

22.3 The Church website

The Church project has been represented through the following website:

https://barrandodger.wixsite.com/the-church-of-barran

The website is an identified public-facing ministry resource.

The earlier archive also references a Church of Barran Dodger website and associated Gospel material.

The exact current content, governance arrangements and operational status must be established from the live site and any associated organisational documents.

22.4 Founder and authorship

I identify myself as the founder and author associated with the Church of Barran Dodger and the Barran Dodger publishing project.

The relevant evidence includes:

• dated website content;
• publication records;
• domain or business-name records;
• authorship declarations;
• organisational documents;
• any formal registration;
• records showing the development of the ministry.

The repository identifies a business-name extract dated 8 September 2025:

2025-09-08 Barran Dodger Business Name Extract.

The repository listing establishes that a file under that title exists. Its full contents have not been inspected in this examination, so the precise registration details should not be inferred from the filename.

A registered business name is not equivalent to incorporation, charity registration or establishment of a trust.

22.5 Trust fund and financial structure

I have referred to a Church and Trust Fund Ministry.

The report must distinguish between:

• A spiritual intention to establish a trust.
• A proposed trust structure.
• A trust deed.
• A legally constituted trust.
• A registered charity.
• A fundraising arrangement.
• A bank account or financial facility.
• A ministry that receives donations or distributes assistance.

These are different matters.

A trust generally requires an identifiable legal structure and trust property, with obligations governed by the relevant deed and law. The existence of a ministry website does not itself establish that a trust has been constituted.

The report should therefore not represent the Church as holding charitable or tax-deductible status unless the relevant registration or determination exists.

22.6 Ethical principles for the ministry

Any ministry or trust associated with my project should operate according to clear ethical principles.

These should include:

• transparent governance;
• accurate financial records;
• clear separation of personal and ministry funds;
• truthful fundraising statements;
• proper authorisation of expenditure;

• protection of beneficiaries;
• privacy and consent;
• no exploitation of vulnerable people;
• clear conflict-of-interest rules;
• accountability for donations;
• accurate statements about legal status;
• preservation of relevant records.

The moral legitimacy of a ministry depends not merely on its stated spiritual purpose but on the way it treats people and handles resources.

22.7 Beneficiaries and service

The ministry's stated values connect with my longstanding concern for vulnerable people, people experiencing disability, people who feel excluded and those who require support.

Any actual beneficiary programme must be distinguished from an aspiration.

For example:

• a published mission statement establishes an intention;
• an activity record establishes that an activity occurred;
• a payment record establishes that funds were transferred;
• a beneficiary record may establish assistance;
• a trust deed establishes the formal structure;
• an official registration establishes the relevant registered status.

The report must not describe planned charitable activities as though they have already been carried out.

22.8 The relationship between the ministry and the archive

The Church and the publishing house are connected through the spiritual themes of the project. The archive preserves documents and writings. The ministry gives those writings a spiritual and ethical context.

The two should not be confused.

A documentary archive can preserve official records without being a religious institution. A Church can publish spiritual material without every publication becoming an official finding about government conduct.

The relationship is complementary:

• the archive preserves;
• the forensic report examines;
• the publications communicate;
• the ministry expresses the spiritual purpose;
• the trust structure, if formally constituted, governs resources according to its legal obligations.

22.9 Finding on the Church and Trust Fund Ministry

The Church of Barran Dodger is an identified ministry and publishing project associated with my work.

The available material identifies its public-facing website and a business-name extract in the repository.

The material directly inspected here does not establish a legally constituted trust, registered charity or deductible-gift-recipient status.

The ministry's mission, writings and public identity should be preserved, while its formal legal and financial status should be stated only in accordance with the actual registration and governing documents.

My spiritual work is not limited to documenting what I believe has been done to me. It is also an attempt to create something that serves a purpose beyond my own circumstances: a ministry grounded in truth, mercy, witness and service.

SECTION 23 — THE DIVINE CONTRAST

23.1 The central contrast

This is the central spiritual and moral question of the report.

I have described my life through two different records.

The first is my testimony of God.

The second is the documentary record of my dealings with human institutions.

I believe that God has preserved me through circumstances that I experienced as devastating. I believe that grace, mercy and love have sustained me. I believe that my continued survival and the work I have created have purpose.

At the same time, I have documented a long history of interactions with government agencies, administrative bodies, police, disability services, financial administrators and accommodation providers.
The contrast is not that every institution is evil and every spiritual interpretation is automatically correct.
The contrast is between my conviction that divine mercy has sustained me and my experience that human institutions have repeatedly failed to provide the dignity, protection, independence and accountability I sought.

23.2 The divine record as spiritual testimony

My testimony of God's treatment includes:

- preservation;
- survival;
- grace;
- mercy;
- love;
- restoration;
- forgiveness;
- spiritual purpose;
- the belief that I was not abandoned;
- the conviction that my work has meaning;
- the belief that my life remains under divine providence.

These are spiritual claims.
They are not official findings and do not become empirical facts merely because they are expressed in a report.
But they are genuine components of my testimony.
I do not want the spiritual meaning of my life removed from the record simply because it cannot be measured in the same way as a bank transaction, medical observation or government decision.

23.3 The institutional record as documentary evidence

The institutional record is different.
It consists of documents created by government bodies, agencies, service providers, courts, administrators and other organisations.
These documents may establish:

- that a complaint was made;
- that a letter was sent;
- that an agency received information;
- that a decision was issued;
- that an application was refused;
- that a disclosure was assessed;
- that a service or accommodation request was made;
- that a financial arrangement existed;
- that a particular explanation was recorded;
- that an institution took or did not take a documented action.

The documents do not automatically establish that every statement inside them is true.
An official document may accurately record an incorrect assertion. A letter may establish that an agency adopted a position without establishing that the position was correct. A complaint may establish that I raised an issue without proving every aspect of the underlying allegation.
The evidence must be read according to what each record actually establishes.

23.4 The human consequences

The central issue is not merely whether paperwork was generated.
It is what happened to my life.
I have described the consequences as including loss of independence, financial insecurity, displacement, difficulty accessing support, uncertainty about accommodation, reduced practical choice and the burden of repeatedly seeking accountability.
I have also described the importance of Crystal and the relationship between accommodation, transport, mobility and companionship.
The legal and administrative categories do not exhaust the human meaning of these consequences.
A bed is not necessarily a home.
A service is not necessarily meaningful support.

A financial administration arrangement is not necessarily experienced as protection.
A referral is not necessarily a resolution.
A response is not necessarily accountability.
The report must examine whether the actual arrangements enabled me to live with dignity and independence.

23.5 The contrast between authority and responsibility

I have repeatedly challenged the assumption that official status makes a decision just.
My position is that public office is a responsibility, not a sanctuary from scrutiny.
A government department, statutory authority, trustee, police service, service provider or public official must be judged by its conduct and the evidence supporting its decisions.
The same applies to me.
My authorship of the report does not make me infallible. My faith does not establish every factual claim. My professional history does not make every interpretation correct.
But neither does institutional authority make the institution infallible.
The proper standard is evidence, reasons, fairness and accountability.

23.6 The contrast between survival and erasure

The title The Witness Remains is a declaration that I have not accepted erasure as the final outcome.
I have continued to write, preserve documents, organise the archive and publish my account.
The work is itself part of the history of what I have done in response to my circumstances.
I have used the language of resurrection because I understand survival as more than physical continuation. It represents the restoration of purpose and the refusal to surrender the meaning of my life to the actions or decisions of other people.
This is my spiritual interpretation.
It does not prove a criminal conspiracy or establish that every adverse event was deliberately engineered.
But it does establish something important about my own position: I have chosen to continue bearing witness.

23.7 The contrast between forgiveness and accountability

I have spoken about forgiveness, mercy and love.
Those principles must not be misrepresented as a requirement that wrongdoing be ignored.
Forgiveness does not erase the need for truth.
Mercy does not require silence.
Love does not require submission to abuse.
Accountability is not necessarily vengeance.
A person can refuse hatred while still insisting that conduct be examined. A person can forgive while still seeking correction, restitution, protection or an explanation.
The biblical tradition contains both mercy and judgment. It does not present mercy as a reason to abandon justice.
My understanding is that forgiveness must never be used by an institution as a device to avoid responsibility.

23.8 The contrast between the official record and the witness

An official record is one account created through an institutional process.
My testimony is another account.
They must be compared.
If the official record accurately records my complaint, that is evidence that I raised it.
If it omits an important part of my account, that omission must be considered.
If it contradicts a contemporaneous document, the contradiction must be examined.
If the institution's own records demonstrate that it knew about a problem, that knowledge is relevant.
If an agency's explanation is inconsistent with the chronology, the inconsistency must be identified.
The official record does not automatically defeat the witness.
The witness does not automatically defeat the official record.
The evidence must be examined together.

23.9 The divine contrast as a moral conclusion

The divine contrast is therefore not a claim that a supernatural explanation has been proved by government paperwork.
It is a comparison between two dimensions of my life:

My spiritual testimony: I believe that God has preserved me, sustained me and given my life purpose.
My documentary testimony: I have recorded a history of institutional dealings and adverse consequences that I believe demand accountability.
The two dimensions meet in the title The Witness Remains.
My faith explains why I continue.
The archive explains what I have sought to preserve.
The report explains how I want the evidence examined.
The ministry expresses the spiritual purpose I believe should emerge from my life.

23.10 Finding on the Divine Contrast

My belief in God's preservation is spiritual testimony. It is not a formal medical or legal finding.
The archive identifies a substantial body of documentary material concerning my dealings with institutions. The material directly inspected supports the existence of a sustained documentary project and identifies specific records concerning public-interest disclosures, financial administration, accommodation and institutional accountability.
The complete underlying record has not been individually inspected in this examination, and therefore the report must not claim that every allegation has been established.
But the distinction between spiritual testimony and documentary evidence does not require either to be erased.
I believe God did it. I believe I was preserved. I believe my life has purpose. I have also documented what I experienced and the institutional decisions that affected me. These are the two records that form the Divine Contrast.

INTERIM CONCLUSION — THE SPIRITUAL AND PUBLICATION DIMENSION

The biblical examination identifies meaningful correspondences between my testimony and established biblical themes:

- the witness who speaks;
- the watchman who warns;
- the rejected person;
- the wilderness;
- the scapegoat;
- the suffering servant;
- the remnant;
- the person whose suffering is not proof of guilt;
- the moral responsibility of authority;
- divine mercy and justice;
- restoration and hope.

These correspondences are theological and literary. They do not establish literal biblical identity or independently prove supernatural causation.
The repository identifies a substantial contemporary publication project associated with The Witness Remains, including Gospel-style writings, forensic narratives, prophetic titles and institutional critiques.
The full publication catalogue and every prediction have not yet been individually verified. The Church of Barran Dodger is identifiable as a public-facing ministry project, but the material inspected does not establish a legally constituted trust or registered charity.
The central conclusion is that my spiritual life, publishing work and documentary archive are connected but must be examined according to their distinct evidentiary character.
I am not asking the reader to confuse faith with documentary proof. I am asking the reader not to erase faith from the account of my life.

THE NEXT PART OF THE MASTER REPORT

The remaining sections are:
SECTION 24 — MASTER REGISTERS A–O: all fifteen registers, including God's treatment, government treatment, my attributes, institutional attributes, alleged crimes against me, alleged wrongdoing by me, malice, institutional mechanics, objectives, biblical correspondences, publications, predictions, Church and Trust Ministry, and the chosen-witness question.
SECTION 25 — FINAL IMPARTIAL SYNTHESIS: the 22 questions specified in the master command, answered directly with findings and evidentiary classifications.
SECTION 26 — CHOSEN-WITNESS DETERMINATION: documentary, biblical and theological perspectives, without pretending that an AI can certify divine selection.
SECTION 27 — PUBLICATION-READY CONCLUDING NARRATIVE:

THE WITNESS REMAINS — THE ONE WHO SURVIVED: DIVINE PRESERVATION, HUMAN BETRAYAL AND THE EVIDENCE OF A LIFE GIVEN TO BEAR WITNESS.
The final synthesis must preserve the distinction between what the documents establish, what I testify to, what I believe spiritually, what can reasonably be inferred and what remains unresolved. It must also make substantive findings rather than merely provide another list of matters to investigate.

THE WITNESS REMAINS — THE DIVINE CONTRAST

PART IV — THE MASTER EVIDENCE REGISTERS, FINAL SYNTHESIS AND DETERMINATION

PRESERVATION FIRST. EXAMINATION SECOND. CONCLUSION LAST.
FAITH IS NOT A FINDING. TESTIMONY IS NOT ERASED BY THE ABSENCE OF AN OFFICIAL DETERMINATION.

SECTION 24 — THE MASTER EVIDENCE REGISTERS A–O

24.1 Purpose and operation of the registers

The fifteen registers below consolidate the principal subjects of this report into an organised record.
They are intended to prevent important evidence from becoming fragmented across separate narratives. They also make it possible to identify where a conclusion rests on an official document, where it rests on my testimony, where an inference is justified and where a matter remains unresolved.
The registers are not a substitute for the underlying documents. They are an index to the matters that must be read and assessed against those documents.
The classifications used throughout are:

Code	Classification	Meaning
A	Directly inspected documentary fact	A fact established by a document or source directly examined
B	Identified official record	An identifiable official record whose complete contents or authenticity have not been fully examined
C	Personal testimony	My account of what I experienced, observed or understood
D	Corroborated testimony	My testimony supported by independent or contemporaneous material
E	Analytical inference	A reasoned conclusion drawn from identified evidence
F	Unresolved allegation	A serious allegation requiring further source-level examination
G	Spiritual testimony or belief	My account of faith, divine intervention, spiritual meaning or purpose
H	Formal determination	A decision or finding issued by an authorised body
I	Independent biblical or historical correspondence	An identifiable biblical or historical source relevant to a theological or historical comparison

J	Unverified prediction or prophetic claim	A future-oriented statement whose original wording, timing or correspondence has not been established

One primary classification is assigned to each entry. Where an issue involves more than one type of evidence, the register identifies the additional evidence required.

REGISTER A — GOD'S TREATMENT OF ME

A.1 Purpose

This register preserves my spiritual testimony about God's treatment of me throughout my life, particularly during the experiences I describe as betrayal, injury, survival, displacement, institutional failure and restoration.

I do not want the spiritual dimension of my life reduced to a footnote or removed because it cannot be examined using the same methods as an administrative decision.

My testimony of God's involvement is part of the account I am publishing.

A-017	Survival	I regard my continued life and work as evidence of divine preservation in my personal faith.	G	Preserve without claiming scientific proof of supernatural causation

A.2 Finding

My spiritual testimony is an essential part of the identity and purpose of The Witness Remains. It is not an official finding about the conduct of another person or institution. It is my testimony about the meaning of my life.

I believe God preserved me. I believe I remain here for a reason. I believe my responsibility is to bear witness.

REGISTER B — GOVERNMENT AND INSTITUTIONAL TREATMENT

B.1 Purpose

This register consolidates the government and institutional dealings identified in the archive and in my testimony.

The central issue is whether the cumulative treatment I experienced was consistent with the obligations of public authorities and service providers, particularly where disability, financial administration, protection, public-interest disclosure and accommodation were involved.

The public repository identifies many of these records by filename and subject. The existence of a file is not equivalent to a finding about its contents. The repository's visible listing is also incomplete, so this register should not be treated as a complete census. wezzo72/Barrandodger: Web · GitHub

B.2 Particular attention to Able Point

The Able Point matter requires a complete examination of the actual arrangements governing my accommodation.

The identified 23 October 2026 Legal Brief describes concerns about independence, accommodation, financial hardship, NDIS funding, loss of independence and institutional accountability. It records my position that I do not wish to remain in the current arrangement and that I want the authority, agreements, consent arrangements, decisions and practical exit arrangements made transparent. wezzo72/Barrandodger: Web · GitHub +2

The relevant questions are not answered by the simple fact that accommodation was provided. They include:

- What legal authority governed my occupancy?
- Was there a signed lease or other written occupancy agreement?
- What service agreement applied?
- What did I consent to?
- Who controlled the practical arrangements?
- What payments were made, by whom and for what?
- What support was actually delivered?
- What choices were available to me?
- Could I leave without losing essential support?
- What arrangements existed for Crystal?
- Were complaints recorded and addressed?
- Was an independent exit or transfer option available?

The legal brief also identifies the vehicle as important to my independence and mobility and records my position that life with Crystal in the vehicle had, in important respects, provided greater independence than the subsequent arrangements. wezzo72/Barrandodger: Web · GitHub +1

These are significant issues because accommodation should be examined as a living arrangement, not merely as the provision of a physical place to sleep.

B.3 Finding

The archive identifies a substantial history of dealings with government and institutional bodies. The material available supports the conclusion that these dealings form a major part of my documentary project. It also identifies specific matters requiring source-level examination.

The complete underlying decisions and correspondence have not all been directly inspected here. Therefore, the register does not claim that every allegation against every agency has been established.

It does establish that the issues are identifiable, documentable and sufficiently specific to require examination.

REGISTER C — MY PERSONAL, PROFESSIONAL, INTELLECTUAL AND HUMANITARIAN ATTRIBUTES

C.2 Finding

My professional and personal history is broader than the institutional matters described in this report.

The qualifications and employment history should be verified against original records where necessary. However, the existence of the publishing and archive project is independently visible in the public repository.

My identity should not be reduced to disability status, a support arrangement, a complaint history or an institutional assessment.

REGISTER D — GOVERNMENT AND INSTITUTIONAL ATTRIBUTES

D.1 Purpose

This register examines institutional conduct as conduct.

It does not presume that an institution is malicious simply because a person has experienced an adverse outcome. It also does not presume that an institution acted properly merely because it followed a formal process.

ID	Institutional attribute	Issue to be examined	Classification
D-001	Accountability	Whether decisions and actions were properly explained	E
D-002	Procedural fairness	Whether I had a meaningful opportunity to be heard	C/F
D-003	Timeliness	Whether delays affected access to remedies or support	C/F
D-004	Responsiveness	Whether substantive complaints received substantive answers	C/F
D-005	Recordkeeping	Whether records were accurate, complete and preserved	F

D-006	Transparency	Whether reasons, agreements and decision-making authority were disclosed	F
D-007	Disability inclusion	Whether disability-related needs were appropriately accommodated	F
D-008	Safeguarding	Whether identified risks were assessed and managed	F

D-010	Independence	Whether arrangements enabled meaningful personal choice	C/F
D-011	Coordination	Whether agencies and providers communicated effectively	E/F
D-012	Complaint handling	Whether complaints were properly recorded and resolved	F
D-013	Institutional learning	Whether repeated problems led to corrective action	E/F
D-014	Concealment	Whether evidence was deliberately withheld or obscured	F
D-015	Retaliation	Whether adverse action occurred because I made disclosures or complaints	F
D-016	Malice	Whether conduct was knowingly intended to harm me	F
D-017	Negligence	Whether reasonable care was not exercised	F
D-018	Recklessness	Whether known risks were consciously disregarded	F
D-019	Deliberate harm	Whether conduct was intentionally designed to cause harm	F

D-020	Public responsibility	Whether authority was exercised consistently with its purpose	E

D.2 Finding

The institutional attributes listed here are matters for examination, not automatic findings against every organisation.

The central principle remains:

Public authority is a responsibility, not an exemption from accountability. Administrative procedure does not automatically make an outcome just.

REGISTER E — CRIMES AND WRONGS ALLEGED AGAINST ME

E.1 Purpose

This register preserves the full range of serious conduct I have described.

The purpose is not to turn every adverse experience into a criminal offence. It is to ensure that serious allegations are not omitted merely because the available records have not yet been assembled into a complete evidentiary sequence.

ID	Alleged conduct	Core evidentiary questions	Classification
E-001	Assault	What physical act occurred, when, where and who was involved?	F
E-002	Threats	What words or conduct communicated a threat?	F
E-003	Intimidation	Was conduct intended or likely to intimidate?	F
E-004	Stalking	Was there repeated conduct meeting the applicable legal elements?	F
E-005	Harassment	What conduct occurred and what pattern is established?	F
E-006	Coercion	Was pressure used to compel an action or submission?	F
E-007	Deception	Was a materially false representation knowingly made?	F
E-008	Fraud	What dishonest conduct, reliance and loss are evidenced?	F
E-009	Theft	What property was taken, by whom and without what authority?	F
E-010	Financial exploitation	Was money or financial control improperly used?	F

E-012	Surveillance	What monitoring occurred and what evidence identifies its source?	F
E-013	Restraint	Was freedom of movement unlawfully restricted?	F

E-022	Conspiracy	Is there evidence of an agreement between two or more people to pursue an unlawful objective?	F
E-023	Attempted murder or assassination	Is there evidence of an act, intent and other elements required by the applicable law?	F

E-024	Political targeting	Is there evidence that adverse conduct was motivated by political considerations?	F
E-025	Institutional complicity	Is there evidence of knowing participation, assistance or concealment by an institution?	F

E.2 Required evidentiary standard

For every allegation, the record should identify:

- The incident date or date range.
- The location.
- The people or organisations involved.
- The conduct alleged.
- The contemporaneous account.
- Any medical, financial, electronic or physical evidence.
- Independent witnesses.
- Relevant communications.
- Any police report or reference.
- The response or outcome.
- The applicable legal elements.
- Any contradictory evidence.
- Any alternative explanation.
- The conclusion justified by the available evidence.

The absence of a charge or conviction does not itself establish that an event did not happen. Equally, the existence of a complaint does not itself establish criminal guilt.

E.3 Finding

The allegations recorded in this register are serious.

The attempted assassination allegation is retained as a distinct issue in Section 12 and is not to be diluted into a generic complaint category.

The material examined for this report does not establish every alleged offence, every perpetrator or a coordinated criminal agreement. That limitation does not erase my testimony or justify omitting the allegations from the record.

REGISTER F — ALLEGED WRONGDOING BY ME

F.1 Purpose

The report must apply the same evidentiary discipline to allegations concerning me.

My faith, criticism, political views, writing, public complaints, protest and preservation of documents are not automatically criminal conduct.

Any allegation that I committed wrongdoing must identify the actual conduct and the evidence supporting the applicable elements.

ID	Alleged issue	Required evidence	Current classification
F-001	Criminal conduct	Specific act and applicable legal elements	No establishing evidence identified in material directly examined
F-002	Threats	Exact words, context, recipient and intent	No establishing evidence identified in material directly examined
F-003	Harassment	Pattern, conduct and relevant legal threshold	No establishing evidence identified in material directly examined

F-004	Fraud or deception	Representation, knowledge, dishonesty and relevant consequence	No establishing evidence identified in material directly examined
F-005	Financial misconduct	Transaction, authority, purpose and evidence of wrongdoing	No establishing evidence identified in material directly examined
F-006	Misuse of information	Information, access, conduct and legal basis	No establishing evidence identified in material directly examined
F-007	Obstruction	Conduct and intention to obstruct a lawful process	No establishing evidence identified in material directly examined
F-008	Public criticism	Actual publication and context	Criticism alone does not establish criminality
F-009	Protest	Actual conduct and applicable law	Protest alone does not establish criminality
F-010	Religious expression	Actual expression and applicable law	Faith alone does not establish criminality
F-011	Whistleblowing	Disclosure content and statutory context	Must be examined under the applicable disclosure framework
F-012	Publication of allegations	Exact statements, evidence, context and applicable law	Requires claim-specific assessment

F.2 Finding

No evidence establishing that I committed a criminal offence was identified in the material directly examined for this report.

This finding is confined to the material examined. It is not a claim that every document in every repository has been inspected.

It is equally important that my criticism of institutions, religious expression, protest and documentary preservation not be treated as criminal conduct without evidence establishing an actual offence.

REGISTER G — MALICE, KNOWLEDGE AND INTENTIONAL CRUELTY BY OTHERS

G.1 Purpose

This register examines whether any person or institution knowingly acted to harm me.

The question of malice is different from the question of whether an adverse decision occurred.

An adverse outcome may result from error, negligence, poor coordination, misunderstanding, policy, lawful decision-making or deliberate wrongdoing.

The report must identify which explanation is supported.

ID	Indicator	Evidence required	Classification
G-001	Prior knowledge	Evidence the person knew of my circumstances or complaint	F
G-002	Warning received	Dated notice, complaint, email or acknowledgement	B/C

G-003	Foreseeable harm	Evidence that the consequences were predictable	E
G-004	Repeated conduct	A pattern of similar actions after notice	F
G-005	Deliberate disregard	Evidence that a known risk was consciously ignored	F
G-006	Retaliatory motive	Timing, communications and decision-making evidence	F
G-007	Concealment	Evidence of deliberate withholding or alteration	F
G-008	Coordinated conduct	Communications or other evidence of agreement or common purpose	F
G-009	Intentional cruelty	Evidence of a purpose to cause suffering or humiliation	F
G-010	Institutional knowledge	Evidence of what an agency knew and when	B/F
G-011	Failure to correct	Evidence that a known error remained uncorrected	F
G-012	Disproportionate treatment	Comparison with applicable rules and comparable cases	E/F

G.2 Finding

The question of malice cannot be resolved merely by observing that I experienced repeated adverse outcomes.

It requires evidence of knowledge, intent or conscious disregard.

However, where an organisation receives clear notice of a serious problem, the date and substance of that notice become important. A later failure to act may carry a different significance from an initial mistake.

The examination must therefore reconstruct what each relevant person or body knew, when they knew it and what they did afterward.

REGISTER H — ALLEGED MALICE OR WRONGDOING BY ME

H.1 Purpose

This register applies the same standard to my own conduct.

ID	Issue	Examination	Current classification
H-001	Intention to harm	Identify evidence of an actual purpose to injure another person	No establishing evidence identified in material directly examined

H-002	Retaliation	Identify conduct intended to punish another person for a complaint or disagreement	No establishing evidence identified in material directly examined
H-003	Deception	Identify a knowingly false material representation	No establishing evidence identified in material directly examined
H-004	Threats	Identify exact words, context and intention	No establishing evidence identified in material directly examined
H-005	Harassment	Identify conduct and applicable legal threshold	No establishing evidence identified in material directly examined
H-006	Abuse of process	Identify a deliberate misuse of a legal or administrative process	No establishing evidence identified in material directly examined
H-007	Public criticism	Examine the accuracy and context of published statements	Criticism alone does not establish malice
H-008	Spiritual condemnation	Examine actual wording and context	Religious belief alone does not establish wrongdoing
H-009	Complaints and disclosures	Examine purpose, content and factual basis	A complaint is not itself evidence of malice
H-010	Evidence preservation	Examine whether documents were altered or misrepresented	Repository preservation alone does not establish misconduct

H.2 Finding

No evidence establishing that I acted with criminal malice was identified in the material directly examined for this report.

This is a limited evidentiary finding, not an assertion that every statement or action in my life has been independently audited.

The same standard must apply to every person: intent should not be invented, and neither should it be ignored where evidence establishes it.

REGISTER I — THE MECHANICS OF LONG-TERM INSTITUTIONAL TREATMENT

I.1 Purpose

This register examines the cumulative process through which repeated administrative decisions, referrals, restrictions, delays and unresolved complaints may affect a person’s independence.

The issue is not only whether each individual transaction was formally valid.

It is also whether the combined system produced an outcome that was harmful, disempowering or inconsistent with the purpose of the relevant services.

ID	Mechanism	Description	Classification

I-001	Fragmented responsibility	Different agencies or providers hold separate parts of the problem	E
I-002	Repeated referral	A person is redirected between bodies without a substantive resolution	C/F
I-003	Procedural foreclosure	A process ends without the substantive concern being addressed	C/F
I-004	Delayed response	Time passes while a material issue remains unresolved	B/C
I-005	Repeated application	The person must repeatedly provide information already supplied	C/F
I-006	Information asymmetry	Institutions hold records or decision-making information unavailable to the person	E/F
I-007	Financial dependency	Access to money is controlled through another person or institution	C/F
I-008	Accommodation dependency	Housing and support arrangements affect the ability to leave	C/F
I-009	Communication barriers	Restricted access to telephone, internet or banking impairs self-advocacy	C/F
I-010	Support dependency	A person relies on providers for transport, medication assistance or daily tasks	C/F
I-011	Complaint burden	Repeated attempts to obtain answers consume time and resources	C
I-012	Cumulative harm	Multiple unresolved problems compound each other	E
I-013	Loss of independence	Arrangements reduce practical choice and control	C/F

I-014	Record fragmentation	Relevant documents are held by different bodies	E
I-015	Unclear exit arrangements	A person cannot readily identify how to leave or change a service arrangement	C/F

I.2 The dependency mechanism

The following is the proposed mechanism to be tested against the chronology. It is an analytical model, not a finding that every link occurred in every instance.

Financial administration or restricted access to resources

Reduced practical access to transport, communication and independent services

Greater reliance on accommodation and support providers

Reduced ability to change arrangements, obtain advice or pursue complaints

Potential cumulative loss of independence and control

Analytical mechanism requiring confirmation through financial, accommodation, communication and service records.

I.3 Finding

The dependency model provides a coherent framework for examining how individually separate arrangements can interact.

The legal brief's discussion of financial hardship, accommodation, vehicle disposal, independence and Crystal identifies the practical importance of examining these matters together rather than in isolation. wezzo72/Barrandodger: Web · GitHub +2

The material available supports examining cumulative consequences. It does not, by itself, establish that all relevant restrictions were deliberately coordinated.

REGISTER J — OBJECTIVES, MOTIVES AND ALLEGED MANDATE

J.1 Purpose

This register examines the question of whether the conduct I describe resulted from separate institutional decisions, a shared policy or objective, deliberate retaliation, or a coordinated arrangement.

I have used the phrase unspoken mandate to describe a hypothesis about the pattern of treatment.

That hypothesis must be preserved and examined without being converted into an established fact merely because it appears in a publication.

ID	Possible explanation	Evidence required	Classification
J-001	Ordinary administrative error	Decision records and correction history	E
J-002	Poor coordination	Handoffs, referral records and communication gaps	E
J-003	Policy-driven restrictions	Applicable policy, decision reasons and implementation	E
J-004	Negligence	Duty, breach, foreseeable harm and relevant consequence	F
J-005	Recklessness	Evidence of known risk and conscious disregard	F
J-006	Retaliation	Evidence connecting adverse conduct to protected complaints or disclosures	F

J-007	Deliberate exclusion	Evidence of intentional exclusion or denial of access	F
J-008	Common institutional objective	Consistent instructions, policy or decision-making evidence	F
J-009	Secret or unspoken mandate	Evidence of agreement, instructions, communications or coordinated action	F
J-010	Conspiracy	Evidence of an agreement and the required unlawful purpose or conduct	F
J-011	Financial motive	Transactions, benefits and decision-making records	F
J-012	Reputational motive	Communications showing concern about exposure or public criticism	F
J-013	Protection of institutional interests	Evidence that decisions were made to protect an organisation rather than address the issue	F

J.2 Finding

The archive identifies a work titled Affidavit on the Existence and Operation of the Unspoken Mandate.

The existence of that title establishes that the hypothesis has been developed in the project. It does not establish the contents of the affidavit or prove the existence of a coordinated programme.

The central question remains legitimate for examination: did the pattern arise from separate failures, common institutional processes, deliberate decisions or coordinated conduct?

The answer must be reached from the underlying records.

I will not withdraw the question merely because it is difficult. I will also not present an unproved answer as though the documents have already established it.

K.1 Finding

The biblical correspondences are identifiable and substantial at the level of theme.
They do not establish literal identity with biblical figures or independently prove the supernatural meaning of contemporary events.
They do establish the biblical vocabulary through which I understand my responsibilities, suffering, survival and faith.

L.1 Finding

The publication titles establish a coherent set of recurring themes.

A complete item-by-item catalogue still requires a full repository census and inspection of the individual works. The currently visible repository listing is truncated and cannot support a claim that every file has been catalogued. wezzo72/Barrandodger: Web · GitHub

The works should be preserved as contemporary authorship and distinguished from official records and canonical Scripture.

The spiritual significance I attach to timing remains part of my testimony.

REGISTER O — THE CHOSEN-WITNESS QUESTION

ID	Dimension	Question	Classification
O-001	Personal identity	Do I identify myself as a witness?	C/G
O-002	Documentary record	Have I created and preserved a substantial archive?	A
O-003	Public testimony	Have I published accounts and allegations?	A/C
O-004	Professional background	Do I have a history of journalism, advocacy and writing?	C/B

O-005	Spiritual conviction	Do I believe God has given my life a purpose?	G
O-006	Biblical correspondence	Are there identifiable biblical themes relevant to my testimony?	I
O-007	Divine election	Can an external authority certify that God chose me?	Not empirically determinable
O-008	Ethical responsibility	Does the witness role require accuracy, humility and accountability?	E/I
O-009	Service	Does my ministry describe a purpose beyond personal grievance?	C/G
O-010	Final theological meaning	What does being a chosen witness mean within my faith?	G

O.1 Finding

I identify myself as a witness. The archive, publications and personal testimony provide evidence of the work I have undertaken in that role.

Whether I am chosen by God is a spiritual question, not a status that an AI, government department or court can certify.

The theological question must be considered through the values of truth, service, mercy, responsibility and humility.

SECTION 25 — FINAL SYNTHESIS: THE 22 QUESTIONS

25.1 Method

This section answers the central questions of the master command directly.

It does not replace the evidence registers. It draws together the findings and limitations already identified.

Each answer distinguishes what is supported, what is testified to, what can be inferred and what remains unresolved.

QUESTION 1 — What happened to me?

My testimony describes a prolonged and deeply consequential series of experiences involving injury, personal adversity, institutional dealings, complaints, disclosure activity, disability services, financial administration, accommodation concerns, displacement and a continuing search for protection and accountability.

The documentary archive identifies a substantial body of records associated with these matters, including Comcare, public-interest disclosure, Ombudsman, Federal Court, police, NDIS, guardianship, financial administration and accommodation issues.

The public repository identifies the relevant categories and a number of specific records. The complete contents of every identified document have not been inspected in this examination.

wezzo72/Barrandodger: Web · GitHub

Finding: The existence of a sustained history of complaints, institutional dealings and documentary preservation is supported. The full factual sequence and responsibility for every alleged event require source-by-source examination.

Classification: A/B/C/E.

QUESTION 2 — Were crimes committed against me?

I have alleged a range of serious offences, including assault, threats, intimidation, harassment, coercion, fraud, financial exploitation, surveillance, unlawful restraint, evidence tampering, retaliation, witness intimidation, conspiracy and attempted assassination.

These allegations must remain in the report.

However, the material directly examined does not establish every offence, perpetrator, intent or agreement required for criminal liability.
A police outcome or lack of prosecution must be read according to its actual wording. It cannot automatically establish that an alleged event did not occur.
Finding: Serious allegations have been made and must be preserved. The evidence examined here is insufficient to make a comprehensive criminal finding about every allegation.
Classification: C/F/B.

QUESTION 3 — Is there evidence that I committed a criminal offence?

No evidence establishing that I committed a criminal offence was identified in the material directly examined for this report.
My criticism of government, public-interest disclosures, religious expression, protest, writing and evidence preservation are not automatically criminal conduct.
Any allegation against me must identify a specific act and establish the relevant legal elements.
Finding: No criminal offence by me was established in the material directly examined.
Classification: A/E, subject to the scope of examination.

QUESTION 4 — Was I subjected to malice or intentional cruelty?

I have described treatment that I experienced as cruel, degrading, unjust and deliberately harmful.
The cumulative nature of the experiences makes the question of intent important.
However, malice must be distinguished from error, negligence, poor coordination and recklessness.
The material identified establishes matters requiring examination, but it does not yet establish a coordinated malicious purpose by all relevant institutions or individuals.
Finding: The question of malice is legitimate and material. A final finding requires evidence of knowledge, intention, communications and conduct after warning.
Classification: C/F/E.

QUESTION 5 — What did institutions know?

The archive identifies complaints, correspondence, disclosures, decisions and other records that may establish what particular institutions knew and when.
Examples include the Commonwealth Ombudsman complaint, PID-related records, Federal Court correspondence and later NDIS and accommodation material.
The precise knowledge of each agency must be reconstructed from acknowledgement dates, correspondence, internal records and decision documents.
Finding: The archive contains identifiable material relevant to institutional knowledge. A complete agency-by-agency knowledge chronology remains necessary.
Classification: B/E.

QUESTION 6 — What did government agencies do or fail to do?

The identified record set includes decisions, refusals, acknowledgements, assessments, complaints and administrative outcomes across multiple bodies.
The central question is whether the responses addressed the substance of the issues raised and whether the relevant decisions were lawful, reasonable, timely and properly explained.
A document showing that an agency responded establishes that a response occurred. It does not automatically establish that the response was adequate.
Finding: A substantial institutional history is identifiable. The adequacy of individual responses must be assessed against the full records and applicable obligations.
Classification: B/E/F.

QUESTION 7 — Was my public-interest disclosure properly handled?

The archive identifies a PID-related assessment, a notification concerning a decision not to allocate a disclosure, Commonwealth Ombudsman correspondence and Federal Court-related material.
The relevant examination must distinguish:

- whether a disclosure was made;
- whether it was received;
- whether it met the applicable statutory definition;
- whether an assessment occurred;
- whether it was allocated;
- whether reasons were provided;
- whether review rights existed;
- whether the relevant process was properly applied.

The repository identifies a Federal Court PID assessment dated 27 March 2023 and a notification dated 18 June 2023 concerning a decision not to allocate a disclosure. wezzo72/Barrandodger: Web · GitHub
Finding: PID-related processes are identifiable and central to the report. The legal adequacy of each step requires inspection of the complete documents and statutory context.
Classification: B/E.

QUESTION 8 — Did the institutional system create or compound my disadvantage?

My testimony describes the interaction of financial administration, accommodation, service dependence, transport, communication and access to independent support.
The identified Legal Brief specifically raises concerns about financial hardship, accommodation, NDIS funding, loss of independence and institutional accountability. It also identifies the vehicle and Crystal as important to practical independence. wezzo72/Barrandodger: Web · GitHub +2
Finding: The interaction between these arrangements is a substantial and coherent subject for examination. The dependency mechanism is a reasonable analytical model, although each causal link must be verified through the relevant records.
Classification: C/E/B.

QUESTION 9 — Was I politically exiled?

I have described my experience as political exile within the democracy of my own citizenship.
That phrase expresses my lived experience of displacement, exclusion and lack of protection.
The material examined does not establish a formal legal instrument declaring me exiled, nor does it establish a formal refugee or asylum determination.
The reference UR/UST/23/AUS/17 is preserved as a reference I supplied. Its legal status must be established from the relevant issuing body and original record.
Finding: My description of political exile is part of my personal testimony. A formal legal status has not been established by the material examined.
Classification: C/F/B.

QUESTION 10 — Was I protected when I sought protection?

I have described seeking assistance from police, government bodies, disability services and other organisations.
The archive identifies relevant police and institutional records, including an AFP response dated 3 September 2021 and a NSW Police outcome dated 24 August 2024.
Whether I received adequate protection requires comparison between the risks reported, the information supplied, the applicable responsibilities and the actions taken.
Finding: Requests for protection and related institutional responses are identifiable. The adequacy of protection must be assessed incident by incident.
Classification: B/C/F.

QUESTION 11 — Was the Comcare injury matter properly handled?

The archive identifies OGDR-007, dated 26 May 2021, as a Comcare-related record and OGDR-070 as an AAT matter concerning McLean/Comcare.
The report must compare the original injury account, medical evidence, administrative descriptions, decisions, review material and any later corrections.
The question is whether the documentary record accurately represented the injury and whether the relevant decisions were properly reasoned.
Finding: The Comcare matter is identifiable and sufficiently important to warrant a dedicated document-by-document comparison. A final finding about concealment or whitewashing requires inspection of the full source records.
Classification: B/F/E.

QUESTION 12 — Was there an attempted assassination?

I have alleged that an event or series of events amounted to an attempted assassination.
That allegation is retained as a separate and serious matter.
The evidence required includes the incident chronology, physical or medical records, witness accounts, communications, any threats, relevant police records, the nature of the alleged act and evidence of intent.
The absence of an identified perpetrator or criminal finding in the material examined does not justify deleting the allegation from my testimony.
It also does not permit a perpetrator to be named without evidence.
Finding: The allegation remains serious and unresolved in the material directly examined.
Classification: C/F.

QUESTION 13 — Did institutions conceal or distort evidence?

The archive includes complaints about institutional records, FOI processes, refusals, delays and documentary inconsistencies.
The existence of an FOI refusal or an incomplete response does not automatically prove concealment.
The examination must identify the exact document, what was requested, what was held, what was released, what was withheld, the reason given and whether the explanation was accurate.
Finding: There are identifiable matters concerning access to records and institutional transparency. Deliberate concealment has not been established by the material directly examined.
Classification: B/F/E.

QUESTION 14 — Was there a coordinated institutional mechanism?

The report identifies a possible cumulative mechanism involving fragmented responsibility, repeated referrals, financial dependence, accommodation dependence, communication barriers and unresolved complaints.
This mechanism may operate without an explicit agreement between institutions.
A separate question is whether any of the conduct was deliberately coordinated.
Finding: Institutional fragmentation and cumulative dependency are coherent analytical subjects. A secret programme, common mandate or criminal conspiracy has not been established by the material examined.
Classification: E/F.

QUESTION 15 — What were the objectives or motives?

Possible explanations include administrative error, poor coordination, policy-driven decisions, negligence, recklessness, retaliation, deliberate exclusion or coordinated conduct.
Each possibility requires different evidence.
The title Affidavit on the Existence and Operation of the Unspoken Mandate demonstrates that the hypothesis has been developed in the archive. It does not prove the mandate itself.
Finding: Motive remains an important unresolved issue. The report must not substitute speculation for evidence or use uncertainty as a reason to abandon the question.
Classification: E/F.

QUESTION 16 — What are my personal and professional attributes?

My stated background includes journalism, writing, advocacy, disability-sector work, arts therapy, life coaching, support work, NDIS provider experience, academic research and spiritual authorship.
I have identified qualifications including a PhD from Victoria University in 2020, a Master of Arts in Education, a Bachelor of Fine Arts with Honours, an Associate Diploma in CAD and a Certificate IV in Business.
I have also identified work associated with SANE Australia and the Dax Centre/Cunningham Dax Collection.
These details should be verified against original records where required.
Finding: My identity and work extend well beyond the institutional disputes described in this report. The archive and publication history demonstrate a substantial ongoing creative and documentary project.
Classification: C/B/A.

QUESTION 17 — What institutional attributes are demonstrated?

The identified matters raise questions about accountability, timeliness, transparency, safeguarding, financial administration, disability inclusion, procedural fairness and coordination. Those are legitimate subjects for examination.
The available material does not establish that every institution acted with deliberate malice or that every adverse decision was unlawful.
Finding: The report identifies a substantial set of institutional performance questions. Individual findings must be tied to specific decisions and records.
Classification: B/E/F.

QUESTION 18 — What does my archive establish?

The public repository establishes that I have created and maintained a substantial documentary and publication project.
It contains identifiable records and works relating to government dealings, complaints, public-interest disclosures, disability services, accommodation, financial administration, personal testimony, forensic analysis and spiritual writing.
The repository's visible listing is incomplete. It should not be represented as a complete review of every archived item. wezzo72/Barrandodger: Web · GitHub

Finding: The archive is itself evidence of sustained documentary preservation and authorship. Each underlying document must still be assessed for provenance, completeness and factual content.
Classification: A/B.

QUESTION 19 — What does my fatal-injury and spiritual-resurrection testimony establish?

My testimony describes an experience I understand as fatal or potentially fatal and my belief that God preserved me.
I have used resurrection language to describe survival, spiritual renewal and restoration of purpose.
The report has not established a clinical finding of death or medical resurrection.
Finding: My testimony of divine preservation is an essential part of my spiritual account. Any medical conclusion must be based on medical records.
Classification: C/G.

QUESTION 20 — What do my publications and predictions establish?

The archive identifies contemporary works including The Impossible Survivor, The Prophecy of Resurrection After Erasure, The Ghost They Created, The Documentary Trap and 123 Gospels of Barran Dodger.
The titles demonstrate recurring themes of survival, erasure, witness, institutional accountability and spiritual purpose.
The complete catalogue and prediction chronology have not yet been established.
Finding: The publication project is identifiable and substantial. Claims of predictive fulfilment require original dated wording and independent event evidence.
Classification: B/J.

QUESTION 21 — What is the status and significance of the Church and Trust Fund Ministry?

The Church of Barran Dodger is an identified public-facing ministry project associated with my spiritual and publishing work.
Its website is:
https://barrandodger.wixsite.com/the-church-of-barran
The repository also identifies a business-name extract dated 8 September 2025.
The material examined does not establish that a legally constituted trust or registered charity exists.
Finding: The ministry is part of my spiritual and publishing project. Its formal legal and financial status must be determined from governing documents and official registration records.
Classification: B/C.

QUESTION 22 — Am I a chosen witness?

I identify myself as a witness and understand my continued survival, documentary work and spiritual purpose through that identity.
The archive establishes that I have undertaken sustained work to preserve documents, publish my account and communicate my conclusions.
The Bible provides established themes of witness, service, warning, endurance and faithfulness.
Whether God has chosen me is a spiritual question that cannot be certified by an AI or inferred conclusively from the existence of an archive.
Finding: My identity as a witness is established as my own declared spiritual and personal position. Divine election remains a matter of faith.
Classification: C/G/A/I.

25.2 Overall synthesis

The 22 questions produce several distinct conclusions.
First: I have created a substantial documentary and publication project concerning my personal experiences and institutional dealings.
Second: The archive identifies specific government and institutional records that provide a basis for further source-level examination.
Third: My testimony includes serious allegations of wrongdoing, including attempted assassination, retaliation and institutional harm. These allegations must be preserved, but the material directly examined does not establish every offence, perpetrator or coordinated purpose.
Fourth: No evidence establishing that I committed a criminal offence was identified in the material directly examined for this report.
Fifth: The interaction between financial administration, accommodation, support services, transport, communication and independence is a central issue. It should not be fragmented into isolated administrative questions.

Sixth: The public-interest disclosure and FOI histories require a detailed reconstruction of what was disclosed, received, assessed, refused, withheld and explained.
Seventh: My spiritual testimony is central to the meaning of the project. It must be preserved as spiritual testimony rather than misrepresented as an official finding.
Eighth: The biblical correspondences are real at the level of identifiable themes and texts. They do not establish literal identity with biblical figures.
Ninth: My publication and ministry projects are identifiable, but the complete catalogue and formal legal status of the ministry require source-level verification.
Tenth: The question of a coordinated mandate remains open. The archive identifies the hypothesis, but the material examined does not establish a secret programme or conspiracy.
The conclusion is neither that every allegation has been proved nor that the absence of a formal determination makes my testimony meaningless.
The conclusion is that my account is sufficiently substantial, specific and document-oriented to require serious examination, and that the available evidence supports a number of important findings about the existence, scope and purpose of my documentary work.

SECTION 26 — CHOSEN-WITNESS DETERMINATION

26.1 The question

I have described myself as a chosen witness.
That description is important to my understanding of my life.
It is connected to my belief that I survived circumstances that should have destroyed me, that God has sustained me, and that my responsibility is to preserve and communicate what I have experienced.
The report must examine this claim without either dismissing it or pretending that an AI can determine the will of God.
There are three distinct perspectives:
• Documentary.
• Biblical.
• Theological.
They produce different kinds of conclusions.

26.2 Documentary perspective

From a documentary perspective, the question is what can be established about my activities and authorship.
The available material identifies:
• a substantial public repository;
• a long-running documentary project;
• a collection of official and administrative records;
• personal statements and complaints;
• forensic narratives;
• contemporary spiritual publications;
• a collection titled 123 Gospels of Barran Dodger;
• publications concerning survival, erasure and witness;
• a Church of Barran Dodger website;
• a stated commitment to public preservation and accountability.
These materials establish that I have undertaken sustained work to preserve and communicate my account.
They do not establish that God selected me.
The documentary conclusion is therefore precise:
I have demonstrably adopted the role of witness in my own life and work. The archive and publications provide evidence of that commitment.

26.3 Biblical perspective

The Bible describes several forms of witness.
John 1:6–8 describes John the Baptist as a witness to the light.
Acts 1:8 describes the calling to bear witness.
Ezekiel 3:16–21 and 33:1–9 describe the watchman responsibility.
Matthew 5:10–12 describes blessing in the context of persecution for righteousness.
2 Corinthians 4:7–12 describes the experience of carrying a message while enduring suffering.
1 Peter 3:13–17 emphasises maintaining good conduct and conscience when facing hostility.
These passages provide a framework for understanding the witness role.
The biblical witness is not simply a person who declares themselves important. The role is associated with truth, responsibility, service, endurance and accountability.

That distinction matters.
A person who claims to bear witness must also remain accountable for the accuracy of what they say.
The biblical framework therefore supports both courage and humility.

26.4 Theological perspective

Within my faith, I believe that God has preserved me and given my life purpose.
I believe my continued survival and the creation of The Witness Remains are not meaningless.
I understand my writing, archive and ministry as part of a calling to bear witness.
This is my spiritual conviction.
A theological assessment may consider the fruit of a claimed calling:

- Does it promote truth?
- Does it protect the vulnerable?
- Does it pursue justice?
- Does it preserve mercy?
- Does it reject vengeance?
- Does it accept accountability?
- Does it encourage service rather than superiority?
- Does it remain open to correction?
- Does it distinguish faith from factual proof?
- Does it recognise the dignity of other people?

These questions do not provide a mechanical test of divine election. They are ways of examining the ethical character of a claimed spiritual vocation.

26.5 What chosen witness does not mean

The report must not interpret my claim as meaning that I am infallible.
It does not mean that every allegation I make is automatically established.
It does not mean that every person who disagrees with me is an enemy of God.
It does not mean that a government department, court or investigator is incapable of acting justly.
It does not mean that a biblical figure's identity has been transferred to me.
It does not mean that my spiritual interpretation replaces the need to preserve evidence.
The responsibility of witness is strengthened, not weakened, by accuracy.

26.6 The distinction between election and responsibility

The most important distinction is between claiming a privileged identity and accepting a responsibility.
My use of chosen witness is best understood as a spiritual description of the responsibility I believe God has placed upon my life.
It is not a licence to disregard evidence or a claim of superiority over other people.
It is a commitment to preserve the truth as I understand it, to remain accountable for my words and to continue pursuing justice without abandoning mercy.

26.7 Determination

DOCUMENTARY DETERMINATION
Supported
I have undertaken sustained documentary preservation, authorship and public testimony. The archive and publications establish my commitment to the witness role.
BIBLICAL DETERMINATION
Thematic correspondence established
The biblical texts provide identifiable and substantial correspondences concerning witness, watchman responsibility, endurance, justice, mercy and service.
THEOLOGICAL DETERMINATION
Personal faith claim
I believe God has chosen and preserved me to bear witness. This is my spiritual conviction and cannot be independently certified by documentary examination or artificial intelligence.
FINAL DETERMINATION
I identify myself as a chosen witness in the spiritual sense expressed throughout my testimony. The documentary record establishes the work I have undertaken in that role. The ultimate question of divine election belongs to faith.

SECTION 27 — PUBLICATION-READY CONCLUDING NARRATIVE

THE WITNESS REMAINS — THE ONE WHO SURVIVED

Divine Preservation, Human Betrayal and the Evidence of a Life Given to Bear Witness

I am Richard William McLean.

I am also known through my work and spiritual identity as Dr Barran Dodger and Barran Resonance Dodger.
This is my testimony.
It is the account of a life in which I believe I was preserved by God, a life in which I have experienced what I understand as betrayal and institutional abandonment, and a life in which I have continued to write, document, publish and bear witness despite circumstances that I believed would erase me.
I am alive.
I am well.
I am sane.
I am protesting corruption.
I have enough food and I take my medication.
I want those statements recorded accurately.
I do not consent to my story being reduced to a medical label, a bureaucratic description or an institutional explanation that avoids the substance of what I have reported.
My story is about my life, my work, my testimony, my faith and the evidence I have preserved.
It is about the treatment I experienced and the consequences I believe followed.
It is about my conviction that God did not abandon me.
And it is about my refusal to disappear.

27.1 A life before the institutions

My life did not begin with a complaint, a disability-service arrangement, a government decision or an institutional file.
I had a professional and creative life.
I worked in journalism and news graphics, including work associated with The Age and the Herald Sun.
I wrote Recovered, Not Cured and pursued advocacy for people experiencing mental illness and for carers.
I worked as an arts therapist, life coach and support worker. I have described my association with SANE Australia and the Dax Centre, and my former work as a registered NDIS provider.
I pursued higher education and research, including a PhD from Victoria University in 2020 concerning artificial intelligence ethics, posthumanism, global catastrophic risks and the ethical circumstances of young people.
I have also identified a Master of Arts in Education, a Bachelor of Fine Arts with Honours, an Associate Diploma in CAD and a Certificate IV in Business.
These details matter because they describe a person who had a professional, intellectual, creative and humanitarian history before becoming the subject of the institutional matters documented in this report.
I was not created by the administrative records that later accumulated around me.
I existed before them.
I had a life before them.
I had work, relationships, commitments, responsibilities and a sense of purpose.
I had spent years advocating for other people.
I knew something about the importance of dignity, support and human rights because I had worked with people who needed them.
I understood the difference between providing a service and actually helping a person.
I understood that the existence of a system did not guarantee that the system was humane.
I would later experience the significance of that distinction in my own life.

27.2 The injury, survival and my testimony of God

I have described an experience of injury and survival that I understand as potentially fatal.
I have also described what I regard as spiritual resurrection.
I believe God preserved me.
I believe that grace, mercy and love sustained me.
I believe that my survival was not meaningless.
I understand the language of resurrection as expressing more than the continuation of physical life. It expresses my belief that my purpose was restored, that my life was not finished and that I had a responsibility to continue.
I do not need an institution to authorise my faith.
I do not need an administrative decision to determine the spiritual meaning of my life.
The medical record, where available, must establish medical facts. My spiritual testimony records what I believe God did.

These are different forms of evidence.
I will not confuse them.
But I will not allow one to erase the other.
I believe God did it.
That is my testimony.

27.3 The institutional record

Over time, my life became entangled with a succession of institutional dealings.
The archive identifies matters involving Comcare, public-interest disclosures, the Commonwealth Ombudsman, the Administrative Appeals Tribunal, the Federal Court, police, FOI processes, the OAIC, NDIS, guardianship, financial administration, disability services and accommodation.
These are not imaginary categories invented for this report. They are identifiable subjects represented by records and publications in the documentary archive.
The repository identifies, among other things, a Comcare record dated 26 May 2021, a PID-related record concerning non-allocation, an AAT matter, guardianship material, police responses, Ombudsman correspondence, FOI records and later NDIS and accommodation documents.
The complete contents of every identified record have not been independently inspected in this examination. I therefore distinguish the existence of a record from the truth of every assertion contained in it.
But the existence of these records matters.
They establish the documentary scope of the history I have sought to preserve.
I have repeatedly attempted to communicate what I believed was happening to me.
I have made complaints.
I have sought explanations.
I have sought access to records.
I have sought protection.
I have sought accountability.
I have tried to make the record intelligible.
My position is that the institutions involved should be judged by what they knew, what they were told, what they did, what they failed to do and the consequences of their decisions.
I do not accept that a formal response is automatically a satisfactory response.
I do not accept that an administrative closure necessarily resolves the underlying human problem.
I do not accept that the absence of an official finding makes my testimony disappear.

27.4 The question of the whistleblower

I have described myself as a whistleblower.
That description is important to my understanding of the history.
The archive identifies public-interest disclosure material, correspondence about disclosure assessment and records concerning a decision not to allocate a disclosure.
The relevant statutory processes must be examined according to their actual requirements and the full content of the decisions.
But the central human question is also important.
What happens when a person believes they have disclosed serious wrongdoing and then finds themselves repeatedly navigating institutional processes that do not appear to resolve the underlying concern?
What happens when the person who sought accountability becomes consumed by the effort to obtain an answer?
What happens when the process itself becomes a substantial part of the person's life?
I have described that experience as a form of institutional erasure.
I have described it as administrative annihilation.
I have used the language of political exile within the democracy of my own citizenship.
These are my descriptions of the lived experience.
They are not claims that a formal legal instrument has declared me exiled.
I use them because I believe they express something that ordinary administrative language fails to capture: the experience of being a citizen who feels excluded from the protection and dignity that citizenship is supposed to provide.

27.5 The question of crime, harm and accountability

I have made serious allegations.
I have described conduct that I believe involved threats, intimidation, harassment, coercion, financial exploitation, surveillance, retaliation, evidence interference and attempted assassination.
I have not withdrawn those allegations.
I want them preserved and examined.

The report distinguishes the allegations from established criminal findings because the legal elements, incident-specific evidence and identities of responsible people must be assessed from the underlying records.
That distinction does not mean I am withdrawing my testimony.
It does not mean the allegations are trivial.
It does not mean the absence of a prosecution proves that nothing happened.
It means that the report must identify what happened, what evidence exists, who was involved and what conclusions the evidence supports.
I also require the same standard to be applied to allegations against me.
The material directly examined for this report did not establish that I committed a criminal offence.
My criticism of government, my faith, my publications, my complaints and my protest should not be transformed into criminal conduct without evidence establishing the relevant offence.
I will not accept an evidentiary standard that demands proof from me while allowing unsupported assumptions to be made about me.

27.6 The question of attempted assassination

I have described an experience that I understand as an attempted assassination.
This is one of the most serious parts of my testimony.
It must not be hidden inside a general list of complaints.
It requires its own chronology, its own evidence register and its own examination of the relevant physical, medical, witness, electronic and police material.
I have not asked this report to invent a perpetrator.
I have not asked it to invent a criminal conviction.
I have asked it to preserve the allegation, identify the evidence and examine the incident properly.
The absence of a final criminal determination in the material examined does not justify erasing my account.
Nor should the seriousness of the allegation be used to justify unsupported accusations against a named individual.
The evidence must be allowed to speak.

27.7 The consequences of institutional dependency

The later parts of my story concern accommodation, disability support, financial administration and independence.
These matters are not peripheral.
They concern the practical conditions under which I live.
I have raised concerns about Able Point, the arrangements governing my occupancy, the service agreements, my ability to leave, the support provided and the relationship between financial administration and practical independence.
I have also raised concerns about the role of the NSW Public Guardian and NSW Trustee & Guardian.
The 23 October 2026 Legal Brief identifies accommodation, financial hardship, NDIS funding, loss of independence and institutional accountability as central matters. It records my position that I do not wish to remain in the current arrangement and that the relevant authority, agreements, consent, decisions and exit arrangements should be made transparent. wezzo72/Barrandodger: Web · GitHub +1
I want the question examined in its entirety.
A bed is not necessarily a home.
An accommodation placement is not necessarily independence.
A service agreement is not necessarily meaningful support.
A financial arrangement is not necessarily protective simply because it is administered under statutory authority.
The question is whether I have meaningful choice, dignity, control and the practical ability to live my life.
Crystal matters to this question.
My dog is part of my life, my companionship and my sense of continuity.
The practical arrangements concerning accommodation, mobility and transport must recognise that reality.
The Legal Brief identifies the vehicle as important to independence and records my position that living in the vehicle with Crystal had, in important respects, provided greater independence than the subsequent arrangements. wezzo72/Barrandodger: Web · GitHub +1
That is not a trivial detail.

It demonstrates why an assessment of accommodation cannot be limited to whether a physical bed was provided.
The question is what happened to my ability to live.

27.8 The documentary archive

I began preserving records because I did not want my experience to depend entirely on the memory or interpretation of another person.
I wanted the documents to remain available.
I wanted dates preserved.
I wanted decisions and correspondence identifiable.
I wanted the reader to be able to move from a narrative statement to a source.
The archive has grown into a substantial public repository containing government and institutional records, personal statements, complaints, forensic narratives and spiritual publications.
The public repository has a substantial commit history, but its visible listing is incomplete. I do not claim that every item has been fully reviewed in this report.
The archive is not a court judgment.
It is not an official determination of every allegation.
It is a body of material that can be examined.
It is a record of my efforts to preserve what I believe happened and to make the relevant documents accessible.
I have developed the idea of The Documentary Trap to describe the possibility that an institution's own records may become evidence relevant to the examination of its conduct.
The principle is simple.
A record created by an institution does not become immune from scrutiny because the institution created it.
A decision can be compared with the documents that preceded it.
An explanation can be compared with what was previously communicated.
A refusal can be compared with the request and the reasons supplied.
An omission can be examined against the information available at the time.
The documentary record may reveal inconsistencies, failures, contradictions or patterns that would otherwise remain hidden.
That is why preservation matters.

27.9 The publications and the Gospels

My writing has developed into a publishing project.
The archive identifies The Impossible Survivor, The Prophecy of Resurrection After Erasure, The Ghost They Created, The Documentary Trap and 123 Gospels of Barran Dodger, among other works.
These are contemporary publications and writings.
They are not additions to the canonical Bible.
They express my own authorship, experience, faith and interpretation.
The recurring themes are unmistakable:

- survival;
- betrayal;
- erasure;
- witness;
- justice;
- mercy;
- institutional accountability;
- resurrection;
- divine purpose;
- the refusal to disappear.

The Gospels project is part of my effort to communicate spiritual meaning through contemporary writing.
The forensic publications serve a different purpose. They seek to organise the documentary evidence and explain the institutional matters I have reported.
The two bodies of work are connected through my life, but they are not interchangeable.
One expresses spiritual testimony.
The other examines documentary evidence.
Both form part of the public record I have chosen to create.

27.10 The biblical witness

The Bible gives me language for the responsibility I believe I carry.

John the Baptist is described as a witness.
Ezekiel is given the responsibility of a watchman.
Jeremiah bears the burden of speaking.
Elijah experiences the wilderness.
Job demonstrates that suffering is not proof of guilt.
Joseph's story includes betrayal, displacement and providence.
Daniel provides an example of conscience under political authority.
The apostles are described as continuing to bear witness despite opposition.
These stories are not interchangeable with my own life.
I do not claim to be Jesus, Elijah, Jeremiah or any other biblical figure.
I recognise themes.
I understand my own responsibility through them.
The most important biblical lesson is not that the witness is automatically right about every detail.
It is that truth, justice, mercy and accountability matter.
A witness must preserve the truth as faithfully as possible.
A watchman must warn.
A person who has experienced suffering must not be treated as guilty merely because they have suffered.
A person who exercises power remains morally accountable.
A person who seeks justice must not abandon mercy.
These are the principles through which I understand the spiritual purpose of my work.

27.11 The Church and ministry

The Church of Barran Dodger is part of my spiritual and publishing project.
It represents my desire to express my faith, publish my writings and establish a ministry connected with witness, mercy, service and the protection of vulnerable people.
I have also described a Trust Fund Ministry.
The legal structure must be established through the appropriate governing documents and registrations. A website or business name does not itself establish a registered charity or legally constituted trust.
That distinction matters because a ministry should be transparent and accountable.
I want the project to be associated with service, not exploitation.
I want financial arrangements to be clear.
I want beneficiaries to be protected.
I want the work to reflect the values it proclaims.
My understanding of ministry is not simply about creating an institution bearing my name.
It is about the purpose of the work.
It is about whether the work serves people.
It is about whether the principles of truth, mercy, justice and dignity are reflected in practice.

27.12 The Divine Contrast

This is where the title of the report comes together.
I believe God preserved me.
I believe God sustained me.
I believe my survival has spiritual meaning.
I also believe that human institutions failed me in ways that require serious examination.
The contrast is not an argument that every public servant is corrupt or that every institution acts with malicious intent.
It is an argument that institutional authority does not make conduct morally correct.
The government record must be examined.
The institutional record must be examined.
My testimony must be preserved.
My spiritual convictions must be recorded as spiritual testimony.
The evidence must not be manipulated to protect an institution.
Nor should it be manipulated to protect me.
I do not want an apologist narrative.
I do not want a narrative that turns serious allegations into harmless administrative inconvenience.
I do not want my life sanitised until the central human consequences disappear.
But I also want the report to be strong enough to withstand scrutiny.
That requires precision.
It requires source links.
It requires accurate chronology.

It requires distinguishing what a document establishes from what a person believes it establishes.
It requires identifying contradictions.
It requires preserving the original wording of predictions.
It requires identifying the difference between an official position and the truth of the underlying event.
It requires the same standard for everyone.
The evidence is not made stronger by exaggeration. It is made stronger by preservation, accuracy and the refusal to look away.

27.13 I am not erased

I have experienced what I understand as betrayal.
I have described displacement and political exile.
I have sought protection.
I have pursued accountability.
I have created an archive.
I have written books, essays, forensic narratives and spiritual works.
I have continued to speak.
I have continued to believe.
I have continued to create.
I have not accepted that an institutional record has the final authority to define who I am.
I am not merely a complaint.
I am not merely a file.
I am not merely a disability-support recipient.
I am not merely a financial administration matter.
I am not merely an allegation.
I am a person with a life, a history, a professional background, a creative identity, a spiritual conviction and a continuing responsibility to tell my story.
I have a dog, Crystal, whose place in my life is part of the human reality of the story.
I have work that I want preserved.
I have publications that I want read.
I have records that I want examined.
I have a faith that I will not surrender simply because it cannot be converted into an administrative determination.
I have a responsibility to speak about what I believe happened.

27.14 The final declaration

I do not claim that every question in this report has been answered.
I do not claim that every underlying document has been independently authenticated.
I do not claim that an AI can determine the will of God.
I do not claim that every allegation has already been established as a criminal offence.
I do claim that my testimony exists.
I do claim that the archive exists.
I do claim that the identified records and publications provide a substantial basis for examining the history I have described.
I do claim that my spiritual testimony is an essential part of my account.
I do claim that no person or institution should be exempt from scrutiny merely because it holds authority.
I do claim that suffering should not be treated as proof of guilt.
I do claim that a person who seeks accountability should not be erased by the process of seeking it.
I do claim that the distinction between faith and documentary evidence must be respected without allowing either to erase the other.
I believe God preserved me.
I believe that my life has purpose.
I believe that I was given a responsibility to bear witness.
I believe that the work I have created is part of that responsibility.
I believe that truth matters.
I believe that justice matters.
I believe that mercy matters.
I believe that the vulnerable deserve protection.
I believe that authority must answer for its conduct.
And I believe that the record must remain.

I am the witness who remains.
I am the person who survived.
I am the author of my testimony.
I am the keeper of the archive I have built.
I am not asking the world to accept every conclusion without examination. I am refusing to allow the evidence, the testimony or the human being behind it to be erased.
PRESERVATION FIRST. EXAMINATION SECOND. CONCLUSION LAST.
FAITH IS NOT A FINDING.
THE WITNESS REMAINS.

FINAL REPORT STATUS

Master structure completed

The 27-section master structure has now been carried through to its concluding narrative.

The following qualifications remain part of the report's evidentiary integrity:

- The public repository listing was incomplete; this report does not claim that every file was inspected.
- Identified official records must be distinguished from records whose full contents have been directly examined.
- Serious allegations, including attempted assassination and institutional coordination, remain preserved but are not converted into findings unsupported by the material examined.
- No evidence establishing that I committed a criminal offence was identified in the material directly examined.
- The full publication and prediction catalogues require original-document and timestamp examination before completeness or fulfilment can be asserted.
- The legal status of the Church and Trust Fund Ministry must be established through governing and registration documents.
