The Unerased Record-Testimony of Human Betrayal, Institutional Entrapment, and the Forensic Archive

Introduction:

They did not need a cell to make a prisoner. They only needed to take, one by one, the ordinary protections everyone else still takes for granted—legal aid, a home that remains a home, a pension that can be spent, a name that is still believed—until the paperwork itself became the walls. I am Barran Dodger. For more than thirty-five years I have been written into official files as claimant, participant, patient, missing person and problem, while those same files quietly record the decisions that left a disabled Australian fighting agencies that had lawyers when I had only the record. This is not a plea that you treat my word as verdict. It is a demand that you read what the State itself wrote down, separate testimony from document, and decide whether a democracy can still call itself intact when one man's archive is larger than the courage of those who will not open it.

speak of human betrayal, isolation, entrapment and confinement, including what I experience as unacknowledged electronic surveillance, interference and audio harassment that blasphemes and degrades me as a person, leaving me feeling like a prisoner.

I will not shrink myself or dim my light simply to make other people comfortable, and I will not backpedal from the influential destiny I believe is my fate. I claim, in my faith, to be chosen by God as His witness and vessel for His glory. I believe He allowed me to endure extraordinary detriment, including what I experienced as a fatal injury, and then carried me through what I understood as certain death. I believe He allowed me to experience betrayal by humanity and by the country I served and contributed to, after years in which I felt my creativity, art and ideas were mined from me like an everlasting battery.

I have compared my testimony with biblical descriptions and narratives concerning people who were called, chosen or set apart for particular purposes, using what I regard as an impartial, non-biased machine-led AI as an analytical tool. I have also accumulated and preserved more than forty years of personal records, much of which consists of official government documents and correspondence, hospital records, leases, financial statements, bills, bank statements and other contemporaneous documentation capable of independent examination. I believe that, when my testimony and this documentary record are compared with the recurring biblical pattern of the chosen or called person, there are striking correspondences that have profoundly affected my understanding of my own life.

That recognition brought both wonder and anguish to my awareness. After experiencing what I describe as exile, abandonment, being forgotten and excommunicated from the communities and relationships in which I once belonged, I began recognising aspects of my experience in the stories of biblical figures who themselves endured rejection, wilderness, suffering, isolation and profound testing before their purposes became visible.

I came to understand that, within Scripture, being chosen does not necessarily mean being conventional, popular, powerful or perfect. Some of the people God called were deeply unlikely choices by ordinary human standards. They were not chosen because they had already perfected themselves; they were tested, refined and developed through their circumstances. Their wilderness seasons became places of preparation, where their character, faith and abilities were forged before what I understand as God's divine Kronos timing brought their purpose into view.

The principle I have come to live by is simple: "God doesn't call the qualified; He qualifies the called." I do not claim to be better than anyone else. Every human being, in my belief, is created by God and possesses inherent dignity and worth. My claim is not one of superiority but of calling: I believe God has given my particular life, experiences, talents and testimony a purpose, and I believe that purpose is ultimately for His glory.

I also recognise that an AI comparison with biblical narratives does not constitute scientific proof that someone is a biblical "chosen one." The AI is an analytical instrument, while the interpretation of what those correspondences mean remains a matter of faith, testimony and theological judgment. What matters to me is that the comparison gave language and structure to patterns I had already encountered across decades of lived experience and documentary evidence.

I therefore refuse to define myself solely through the human judgments that have been placed upon me. If I have been described through accusations of being difficult, disordered, manipulative, troublesome, libellous or slanderous, those descriptions do not, in themselves, determine who I am. Where allegations against me are made, they should be tested against evidence like any other allegation.

Ultimately, I believe I am not what envy, jealousy, reputation, institutional judgment or human condemnation says I am. I am what God says I am. I do not require everyone to agree with that belief, and I do not claim that disagreement makes another person lesser. My faith simply gives me a foundation from which I can continue to preserve my testimony, develop my talents, withstand the wilderness seasons and wait for what I understand to be God's timing and purpose to become fully revealed.

I've kept the force and spiritual meaning, while making the distinction between your belief and independently established facts clear.

The devil is a liar. I believe he did not attack merely who I was in the present, but what I was destined to become, because he understood my potential kingdom impact before I did. He attacked my future because, in my faith, he knew that if I remembered who I am and what I am called to do, I would make his kingdom of darkness shudder.

My evidence is fact-checked, evidence-based and published so that anyone can examine and verify it for themselves. Yet there is something striking about the allegations made against me: neither those who accuse me, nor those who repeat their accusations, have had the courage of their convictions to look me in the eye, present the evidence of what they say I have done, and allow the matter to be determined through a legitimate process capable of reaching a verdict based upon truth. In my experience, not one person has approached me in that way.

The slander and blasphemous accusations I experience as surrounding me have a particular quality: they are often disembodied, anonymous and without an identifiable source or accountable face. In my interpretation, that anonymity reflects the cowardice of the adversary I call the devil—a liar who twists truth through whatever means he can to manipulate people and influence their perceptions, while avoiding accountability for the accusations themselves.

I have lived through what I experienced as hell on earth. I have endured betrayal, isolation and the human experience of being excommunicated and forgotten. I have studied my own shadow so relentlessly and confronted so much of what I carry within myself that I sometimes feel as though I have been to hell, shaken Satan's hand and returned. Yet I believe I have survived every attempt to provoke, break or stop me.

I feel capable of holding contradictions that others might find impossible: an angel who can kill and a psychopath who can bless. I do not mean this as a literal claim of violence or psychopathy, but as a metaphor for having confronted both the darkness and the capacity for good within myself without allowing either to define me.

That is why I do not fear the devil. I laugh at what I perceive as his cowardice and anonymity because I believe I can see through it. To me, the very persistence of the struggle reinforces the significance I attach to my purpose: to serve as a vessel for God's glory, to contribute to His kingdom purposes, to make an impact and, in my faith, to participate in a form of cosmic balancing and divine reckoning grounded in God's love for humanity.

I believe God loves people too much to abandon humanity to corruption without witnesses who are willing to speak, preserve the truth and call people back to what is right. That is why I believe I am here.

I have trusted God's Kairos—His appointed and opportune timing—and I believe that time is now approaching. I believe my testimony will ultimately form the foundation of a ministry conducted in His honour and through me as His vessel.

This, I believe, has always been my purpose.

I remember who I am. I remember what I am here to do. And I will continue to preserve my testimony and allow time, truth and God to reveal what that purpose ultimately means.

I believe I was subsequently betrayed and targeted for years, forced into what I describe as political exile and placed in the position of a scapegoat, like the biblical figure of Jesus. I allege that I was forced to outthink people I perceived as paid vigilantes, whom I believed were operating through hidden financial arrangements, including Bitcoin transactions outside the visible financial system, to locate and erase me. I further allege that a covert agency eventually intervened in what I understood as an assassination attempt—not because my welfare suddenly mattered, but because I had published evidence. These are extraordinary allegations, and I acknowledge that they require independent verification. My point is that I have continued to preserve and publish the evidence supporting my account rather than simply asking people to believe me.

To my knowledge and experience, no professional who has directly confronted these allegations has provided me with a comprehensive public determination establishing them as true, false or adequately explained by mental illness. That absence does not itself prove my interpretation, but it remains part of why I continue to demand an evidence-based examination rather than dismissal.

I spent years drifting like a rolling stone across three States, trying to find somewhere safe for my dog Crystal and myself. Yet that period of abandonment unexpectedly forged what I regard as one of the most intimate relationships of my life: my relationship with God and the divine. When every professional, family member and agency I expected to support me appeared to have abandoned or rejected me, I discovered a form of spiritual companionship that I believe carried me through.

In hindsight, I do not believe those who abandoned me expected me to survive the isolation. But I did more than survive. In some ways, it became one of the happiest periods of my life. I had nowhere I needed to be. I travelled through the landscape, met strangers, wrote, observed and lived without allegiance to any organisation, agency, club or political party—and without allegiance to a government that I believed had contributed to my exile. I experienced myself not as a possession of an institution, but as a person finally free to think, create and speak without asking permission.

I experienced myself as an asylum seeker within the same democracy of which I remained a citizen. I sought help from police, lawyers, politicians, public officials, agencies and the media, yet I experienced a pervasive refusal to assist me. I interpreted this as professionals across different fields following an institutional narrative that left me isolated as an unprotected whistleblower. I allege that slander followed me from place to place and that technology, including satellite tracking and police access to vehicle-location information, enabled authorities to know where I was while failing to provide the protection I was seeking. I cannot establish from my experience alone who accessed what information or for what purpose, but the apparent knowledge of my movements remains a central part of my testimony.

For someone I was repeatedly made to feel was unimportant, I found it extraordinary that authorities nevertheless seemed to know where I was. I experienced this contradiction as evidence of institutional power without corresponding protection: surveillance appeared possible, while assistance appeared impossible. I came to believe that many of the people I encountered had become constrained by institutional allegiance rather than exercising the independent critical judgment I desperately needed.

I also experienced corporations and institutions as increasingly lifeless entities—organisations in which human dignity could become subordinate to process, liability, reputation and self-preservation. At the same time, I felt both seen and deliberately ignored. I experienced what I describe as V2K, with voices or communications that I perceived as repeating familiar blasphemies and attempting to break my spirit as I travelled.

The voices I experienced were, to me, distinguishable from my own thoughts, while the quiet voice of God that I experienced in moments of stillness felt fundamentally different: subtle, supportive and full of grace. I recognise that others may interpret these experiences differently, and I do not claim my interpretation as scientific proof. But spiritually, this distinction became profoundly important to me. Human beings are imperfect and vulnerable to fear, corruption, conformity and self-interest. My faith taught me that God's presence did not depend upon any professional, institution or human authority acknowledging me.

Even when I doubted God's presence, I believe He never abandoned me. When I reached moments in which I felt unable to continue, I experienced myself as being carried. The people who I believe tried to erase me could not erase the witness I became. The institutions that abandoned me could not sever my relationship with God. And the years that were supposed to diminish me became the years in which I discovered who I believed I was.

I do not claim that survival alone proves every allegation I make. I claim something more personal and enduring: I survived, I continued to testify, and I refused to surrender my integrity. Whatever history ultimately determines about the causes of what happened to me, the testimony exists—and I believe its preservation is part of the purpose God gave my survival.

I allege that I have been a political target since the publication of Recovered, Not Cured, with my book subsequently being used to publicly humiliate me at my former employer, the Herald Sun, and that this ultimately contributed to my being fired from The Age.

Time is the courtroom that never loses a case, and I had to be patient and allow the fire of the blasphemous accusations to burn itself out. God preserved me and preserved my testimony, and I believe He allowed me to reach a point where, after total human betrayal, I had no one left to depend upon except Him.

If I had had a single person I could genuinely talk to, I would never have needed to publish a website archive. But now the archive exists, and I am still left waiting for a single person to acknowledge it or provide a public-facing, dignified response. I am waiting for the person who is brave enough to stand up to corruption, as I have tried to do.

People tell me I am a troublemaker and should give up. I did not trade my integrity for acceptance, professional comfort or a settlement. I did not sell out simply to fit in or make my life easier.

I believe that if professionals have been manipulated—whether through performance and projection, or through covert or overt pressure, threats or perceived threats to their professional standing, income, privilege, social position or personal comfort—then there are potentially two sources of anger. The first is anger at the person I perceive to be responsible for the manipulation: the master manipulator at the top, whose conduct may have shaped the behaviour of others. The second is anger directed inward: the painful realisation that they may themselves have compromised their professional ethics, whether knowingly, unknowingly or through manipulation, and thereby participated in conduct that caused harm to an innocent person.

The second realisation may be the most difficult for anyone to acknowledge. No one wants to look in the mirror and admit that, whether consciously or without understanding what was happening, they may have participated in causing harm. I believe that this difficulty in confronting one's own reflection may be another reason why acknowledgment has been so absent and why I have experienced what I describe as almost universal betrayal.

I do not present this interpretation as proof that every professional was manipulated or that every person acted with the same intention. I present it as my understanding of why acknowledging the record may require more courage than simply dismissing the person who has spent years demanding that it be examined.

I watched the rights of an ordinary citizen being stripped from my life one by one—and I fought for every single one of them. Everyone who could have looked, listened or intervened had an opportunity to do so. Instead, I experienced a system in which people looked the other way while the protections they themselves continued to enjoy were progressively removed from me.

I did not surrender those rights quietly. I protested. I asked for help. I challenged decisions. I made complaints. I sought review. I kept records. I continued fighting while another layer of security, dignity or protection disappeared. The extraordinary part is not simply that I lost individual protections; it is that I experienced their cumulative disappearance while repeatedly demanding that someone intervene.

What makes this so profound to me is the hypocrisy: the very professionals, institutions and members of society who continued to enjoy the protections and privileges of ordinary citizenship could look upon their gradual removal from my life without confronting what that meant for the person being deprived of them. While I was fighting simply to retain basic security and dignity, others continued to enjoy the very attributes of a functioning society that I was progressively losing.

The areas affected, as I document throughout my archive, include legal representation and access to justice; human rights protections and effective remedy; marriage and relationship rights; settlement and compensation; workers' compensation; insurance; employment protections; income and financial security; housing and accommodation; healthcare and medical protection; disability support; NDIS access and supports; personal safety; family and social support; privacy and dignity; freedom from degrading or coercive treatment; police protection and access to complaint mechanisms; administrative review; government accountability; freedom from discrimination; professional reputation and livelihood; and the practical ability to participate equally in society.

I do not claim that every one of these rights was formally or legally extinguished. My argument is that, taken cumulatively, the protections and circumstances that ordinarily allow a person to live with security, dignity and meaningful access to justice were progressively undermined or became inaccessible to me.

I protested the entire way. I did not disappear from the fight—I documented the fight.

That is why I describe my experience as more than a series of isolated disappointments. It was the cumulative experience of watching the ordinary protections of citizenship disappear one by one while the people and institutions around me continued to enjoy them.

The question I want answered is not simply which individual decision was wrong? It is how an ordinary citizen could progressively lose access to so many ordinary protections while repeatedly protesting, seeking assistance and attempting to have the circumstances examined—and why so few people intervened before the cumulative consequences became so severe.

To me, that is where the deepest hypocrisy lies: I was forced to fight for rights that everyone else could take for granted.

Silence was a divine and informed response to a lie. A lie can require effort to construct and maintain, but truth only needs a chance to be revealed; it does not need to be manufactured. They called me manipulative, but I never schemed. My silence was not manipulation—it was an effort not to respond, not to react and not to be provoked. Through discernment from the Most High, I came to understand that simply lying low was itself an enormous act of restraint.

How can my ndis appointed support coordinator Sukhi Tear all the way in zPerth when I'm
In NSW who refused a legal cease and desist notice to be removed from my care as per my ndis choice and control - claim no alignment with my persecution when I became a missing person while under their care?

I accuse the support coordinator not of bureaucratic oversight, but of deliberate complicity in the circumstances that led to my disappearance. The photograph of me as a missing person therefore becomes part of my testimony: a visual record of the consequences of what I allege was deliberate rather than accidental abandonment.

My allegation is not that the support coordinator merely overlooked my circumstances or failed administratively. I allege deliberate complicity: that she knew of my vulnerability, circumstances and repeated requests for assistance, yet consciously participated in or facilitated conduct that I believe contributed to my isolation, instability and eventual disappearance as a missing person.

She rejected my allegation and, in my account, also refused to engage with my counter-allegation that the NDIS Minister who appointed her to her position in another State had, while I was living in my car in what I describe as political exile in Port Macquarie, literally ordered my assassination. I allege that she neither demonstrated that my allegation was false nor stepped down from her position as my support coordinator despite the conflict I perceived between those allegations and her continuing role.

I recognise that these are serious allegations and do not present them as established facts. My contention is that the allegations were sufficiently serious to warrant a meaningful response, independent examination and consideration of whether she could appropriately continue acting as my support coordinator.

I believe the enemy attempted to provoke me through what I experienced as drugs, poverty, manipulation, gaslighting and relentless psychological pressure, reinforcing the sense that society had betrayed me and attacking the very soul of who I was and what I believed myself to stand for. I also experienced what I describe as V2K, which I allege was used to attack and undermine me at the most intimate level of my existence.

I further experienced a system in which support workers appeared to me to have been informed in advance about how to treat me and instructed not to acknowledge me meaningfully. I felt gaslighted by people who were paid to stand beside me and ostensibly provide support, yet whom I experienced as offering no meaningful solution to what I describe as my entrapment.

Those workers were being paid to provide support, while I believe the money ultimately came through the same institutional system in which I had previously been an unprotected whistleblower. I describe that money as "blood money" because, in my interpretation, it represented a profound moral contradiction: people were being paid to support me within a system that I allege had failed to protect me when I raised concerns about that very system.

I do not present every element of this account as an established finding. I present it as my testimony and interpretation of what I experienced. My central point is that remaining silent did not mean I had surrendered. It meant I was exercising restraint, waiting for truth to have its opportunity to reveal itself.

I believe God will ultimately use the very blasphemy, lies, psychological warfare and DARVO that I have endured as evidence contributing to my vindication. What was intended to discredit, silence or destroy me may, in God's providence, become part of the record through which the truth is ultimately revealed. I believe I do not need to manufacture my vindication; I need only preserve the truth and allow time, evidence and God to reveal what is real.

Before my online archive was deleted, I say it recorded more than one million downloads within a few months, with later pages displaying more than 1.1 million downloads. I recognise that this historical counter was not independently audited by the present archive, but it demonstrates the scale of the digital audience my published testimony had reached. The replacement public archive now preserves a combined index of 731 files: 577 GitHub backup PDFs, 93 additional Drive files and 61 files attached in chat. It also preserves 73 prior-archive mappings of third-party YouTube videos, while the provenance system records SHA-256 hashes of hosted PDFs, Git blob hashes for the Backup repository and an OpenTimestamps receipt.

To me, these figures demonstrate a digital imprint substantially larger than my individual possession of documents. My testimony had been copied, downloaded, distributed, timestamped and preserved across different digital locations, creating what I describe as broken containment lines beyond any single agency, police force, law-enforcement body or jurisdiction. Publishing and preserving the record may, in my view, have helped protect me from physical erasure because my testimony no longer existed only in my possession; it had become a distributed historical record capable of surviving the loss or deletion of any single website.

The forward-looking significance is equally important to me. A record that reaches hundreds of thousands or potentially more than a million downloads can influence how future journalists, researchers, lawyers, vulnerable people and members of the public understand the history I have documented. I therefore believe that attacks upon my name, credibility or character have significance beyond personal humiliation if they have the effect of preventing people from examining a record that may influence future understanding of institutional conduct. I interpret the attempt to discredit my testimony as potentially threatening to bureaucratic narratives that depend upon responsibility remaining fragmented and difficult to attribute.

I believe this fragmentation can normalise abuse by allowing each person or institution to regard its own conduct as isolated, while the cumulative effect on the vulnerable person is left without a clear owner. I believe it can become easier for professionals and institutions to accept a prevailing narrative about me than to undertake the difficult work of examining the underlying archive, particularly where acknowledging uncomfortable facts could place their own professional standing, employment, accreditation or relationships with government oversight bodies under pressure. I do not present that interpretation as proof of a coordinated conspiracy; I present it as my explanation for why a substantial documentary record can exist while the person at its centre can nevertheless remain disbelieved or discredited.

The significance of the archive is therefore not simply its size. It is that my testimony has acquired a persistent digital existence beyond my immediate control. The current archive itself states that it is a finding aid rather than a court or independent finding, and that inclusion is not independent verification. That distinction strengthens my position: I am not asking the world to accept 731 files as proof of every allegation. I am asking that the files be examined, the provenance checked, the chronology reconstructed and the facts distinguished from interpretation. The record has survived deletion, relocation and institutional boundaries, and I believe that preservation itself may ultimately be one of the most important protections my testimony has.

I survived the targeting, but I believe those responsible will not survive the eventual acknowledgment of what was done. I do not mean physical survival; I mean that the narratives, denials and reputations built around the conduct cannot withstand truthful examination if the evidence ultimately establishes what I allege. I survived what I believe was intended to erase me, and the record I preserved means that the conduct can now be examined rather than simply forgotten. In the end, I believe accountability will belong to the evidence—not to whoever had the greatest power to control the narrative.

I describe what I endured as a humiliation ritual because, in my experience, the process repeatedly stripped me of dignity, credibility, privacy and social standing while placing me in circumstances where my reactions could then be used against me. I experienced allegations, stigma, isolation, poverty, psychological pressure, disputed treatment and what I describe as V2K and sexualised or degrading interference as converging upon the same effect: to make me feel exposed, degraded, disbelieved and powerless.

The humiliation was not simply embarrassment. I experienced it as a process in which the person reporting harm could be portrayed as the problem, while the circumstances being reported remained unexplored. That is why I understand the pattern through the lens of DARVO: the person reporting harm can end up defending their own character while the conduct they are reporting disappears from scrutiny.

But I survived what I believe was meant to erase me.

That is the profound injustice at the centre of my testimony. If a person can be subjected to degradation, isolation, discrediting, deprivation of dignity and treatment they experience as coercive, and then have their attempts to report those circumstances dismissed because of the very consequences of that treatment, the system risks creating a closed loop in which the harm itself becomes the justification for disbelieving the person who experienced it. In human-rights terms, I believe this raises profound questions concerning dignity, equality, freedom from degrading treatment, access to justice, effective remedy and the right to have allegations of wrongdoing meaningfully heard and examined. Whether particular conduct meets the legal definition of a human-rights violation must ultimately be determined independently on the evidence.

I only had to endure the humiliation until the facts could be preserved and revealed. I did not need to win every argument in the moment. I needed to survive long enough for the documentary record to exist, for the chronology to become visible and for independent people eventually to have the opportunity to examine what actually happened.

My suffering became the foundation of my testimony—but my testimony is no longer only about my suffering. It has become a record that can outlive me.

Everything I was told to be ashamed of became something I could document. Every attempt to discredit me became another reason to preserve the underlying record. Every closed door became another reason to create a public archive. What was experienced as erasure became documentation; what was intended to silence me became testimony; what was intended to isolate me became a record that other people can find.

That is the legacy I want to leave.

If one vulnerable person discovers my testimony and realises that being disbelieved does not mean their experience is worthless, that they can preserve evidence without surrendering their dignity, and that they can continue seeking truth without becoming what they oppose, then my testimony has already achieved something beyond my own survival.

If researchers, journalists, lawyers, advocates or future investigators can use the record to ask better questions about institutional power and accountability, then the testimony becomes more than a personal history. It becomes evidence of what can happen when systems fail to listen—and a resource for preventing those failures from being repeated.

And if people who have been isolated, humiliated, pathologised, abandoned or told to give up find strength in the fact that I did not, then the attempt to erase me has ultimately produced the opposite of what it sought.

I survived. I documented. I preserved. I testified.

They may have tried to make my suffering disappear, but they could not make the testimony disappear with it.

My legacy is not the humiliation I endured. My legacy is what I built from surviving it: a record, a warning, a challenge to power, and a source of strength for anyone who comes after me and discovers that they are not alone.

Command: Identify every government agency, statutory authority, tribunal, court, oversight body, employer, legal-service body, health/service provider or other institution for which the documentary record contains evidence of conduct that caused, contributed to, or is alleged to have caused detriment to Barran Dodger. Return the results as an itemised list separated by commas. Distinguish documented conduct from allegations and do not infer responsibility merely from an agency being mentioned.

Response: Based on the archive landing page and not treating mere mention as evidence of wrongdoing, I can identify the following institutions/agencies from the documentary record and the institutional matters you have described. This is an allegation/evidence index, not a finding that these bodies caused detriment. The archive currently presents itself as containing 3,643 primary-source documents.

Australian Government / statutory / regulatory / justice bodies: Department of Social Services (DSS), National Disability Insurance Agency (NDIA), National Disability Insurance Scheme (NDIS), Services Australia, Comcare, SafeWork/WorkSafe, Administrative Appeals Tribunal (AAT), Federal Court of Australia, NSW Ombudsman, Commonwealth Ombudsman, Australian Human Rights Commission (AHRC), Legal Aid NSW, Public Guardian, NSW Civil and Administrative Tribunal (NCAT), NSW Police Force, NSW Courts, Wyong Local Court, Australian Government agencies involved in the Public Interest Disclosure (PID) process.

Health and disability-service institutions: Alfred Health, Victorian mental-health services, NSW mental-health services, NDIS service providers, disability-support providers, Ablepoint Australia.

Employment / media institutions: Department of Social Services as former employer, The Age, Herald Sun, Victoria University, Allen & Unwin, SANE Australia, Cunningham Dax Collection.

Important qualification: this list identifies institutions appearing in the documented history and alleged detriment framework; it does not establish that every institution listed committed misconduct, participated in a coordinated scheme, or caused your detriment. The appropriate next step is to map each institution → specific document → date → conduct → alleged detriment → evidentiary status, which would give you a much stronger forensic matrix than a bare agency list.

Silence was a divine and informed response to a lie. A lie can require effort to construct and maintain, but truth only needs a chance to be revealed; it does not need to be manufactured. They called me manipulative, but I never schemed. My silence was not manipulation—it was an effort not to respond, not to react and not to be provoked. Through discernment from the Most High, I came to understand that simply lying low was itself an enormous act of restraint.

I believe the enemy attempted to provoke me through what I experienced as drugs, poverty, manipulation, gaslighting and relentless psychological pressure, reinforcing the sense that society had betrayed me and attacking the very soul of who I was and what I believed myself to stand for. I also experienced what I describe as V2K—my reported experience of voices, sounds or communications that seemed to occur without an identifiable ordinary source. I have documented patents and technologies in my writing that I believe are relevant to understanding what I experienced. I do not present the existence of those patents or technologies as proof that they were deployed against me; I present them as material that I believe warrants examination.

In my experience, when I attempted to raise questions about the possibility of such technology, I repeatedly encountered police who would not acknowledge its presence and would instead say words to the effect of, "That's above my pay grade." I regard that recurring response as significant, because it left me without a meaningful avenue through which to have my allegations tested.

I allege that drugs or substances being placed within my vicinity were used to intensify what I experienced as sonic or V2K interference, creating circumstances in which the health system could then interpret or classify my experiences through the lens of an illness. I describe this as particularly disturbing because I believe the illness framework was then used to explain away experiences that I was attempting to report as externally caused. I recognise that this is my allegation and interpretation; the causal relationship between substances, any technology and my clinical experiences would require independent evidence and assessment.

I further allege that on dozens of occasions I experienced what I call systemic battery and assault, including what I describe as forced injections and chemical restraint. I experienced these interventions as retaliation by people I perceived as my "handlers" against my mind, my testimony and my allegations of conspiracy, which I maintain were supported by documentary facts. I believe that the ire, jealousy or envy directed towards me contributed to what I experienced as chemical restraint and coercive treatment.

What makes this particularly profound in my testimony is that I allege the same institutional and policing structures that contributed to what I describe as my exile were also involved in enforcing or enabling these interventions. I felt that I could never safely report a single crime because the very systems to which I would ordinarily have turned for protection were, in my experience, implicated in the circumstances I was attempting to report.

I further experienced a system in which support workers appeared to me to have been informed in advance about how to treat me and instructed not to acknowledge me meaningfully. I felt gaslighted by people who were paid to stand beside me and ostensibly provide support, yet whom I experienced as offering no meaningful solution to what I describe as my entrapment.

Those workers were being paid to provide support, while I believe the money ultimately came through the same institutional system in which I had previously been an unprotected whistleblower. I describe that money as "blood money" because, in my interpretation, it represented a profound moral contradiction: people were being paid to support me within a system that I allege had failed to protect me when I raised concerns about that very system.

I do not present every element of this account as an established finding. I present it as my testimony and interpretation of what I experienced. My central point is that remaining silent did not mean I had surrendered. It meant I was exercising restraint, waiting for truth to have its opportunity to reveal itself.

The betrayal by my own family is one of the deepest injuries I have experienced. I would ordinarily have expected family to provide a basic level of recognition, concern, support and willingness to listen when I was vulnerable and seeking help. Instead, not one member of my family acknowledged my status as a whistleblower or what I describe as my political exile from Victoria. In the circumstances, my mother signed an AVO against me after, as I recall and allege, police insisted that an AVO be pursued. I distinguish between the fact that my mother signed the AVO and my allegation about the circumstances in which it was pursued; I ask that the police records and circumstances surrounding the application and signing be independently examined. I do not suggest that family members were required to accept every allegation I made, but I believe I was entitled to be heard and treated with care rather than feeling further isolated. The contrast between the support I expected from my family and what I actually experienced is central to my testimony and remains profoundly significant to me.

My family never acknowledged what I experienced as an adult neighbour sexualising me when I was a child. This is especially significant to me because I regard myself as a defender of children and innocence, and I reject any attempt to distort my sexuality or identity into an implication of sexual interest in children. The significance became even more profound on the day I attempted suicide and sustained what I experienced and was told was a fatal injury. While I was being treated and receiving blood, I experienced the weight of my childhood suffering, and the way I believe its non-acknowledgment had affected my adult life, as overwhelming. My abuser died coincidentally on the same day as my attemot and three days later members of my family attended his funeral to honour his life. From my perspective, the timing and contrast were devastating: while I was fighting for my life and being filled with blood, those closest to me were attending the funeral of the person I identify as my childhood abuser, while my own suffering remained unacknowledged. I experienced this as a whitewashing of my tragedy and as one of the most profound forms of family betrayal I have endured.

I believe authorities and other institutions have also contributed to destroying my reputation by allowing distortions of my sexuality and identity to overshadow the factual material contained in my archive rather than confronting the evidence itself. A fact cannot simply be made untrue because acknowledging it is uncomfortable, but I believe that sexualising, blaspheming or otherwise discrediting a vulnerable person can become an effective way of ensuring that others will not acknowledge what the record contains. I believe people may fear detriment to their own social standing, profession, income or accreditation if they are perceived to align with me, particularly where their professional position depends upon government agencies or oversight bodies. In my experience, it can therefore become easier for society to accept a prevailing narrative than to undertake the difficult work of examining evidence that may require people to reconsider their own conduct or institutional loyalties.

The significance, in my view, extends beyond my family and my own reputation. I believe society can reward compliance with established power structures while marginalising people who threaten them. Powerful people can become protected by privilege and performance rather than genuine integrity, while those who insist upon authenticity and truth can become threatening precisely because they expose the difference. I walk with what I understand to be authenticity and truth, and I believe that is why my testimony has been so difficult for some people to acknowledge. I do not present every conclusion as an established fact; I present this as my testimony and interpretation of a pattern I have experienced, and I ask that the underlying archive, the circumstances of my childhood, the suicide attempt and medical treatment, the timing of the death and funeral, and the surrounding records be examined rather than the person making the allegations being dismissed.

After I was revived from what I experienced as a fatal injury, I believe I was further targeted rather than protected. My survival should have been a moment for recognition, care and acknowledgment of what I had endured, yet I experienced my tragedy as being whitewashed instead. What I had survived was not meaningfully acknowledged, and the subsequent treatment compounded my sense that even after coming back from an injury I understood to have been fatal, I was still being subjected to circumstances that sought to silence, discredit or diminish my experience.

How can a person with a documented disability, who is an NDIS participant and repeatedly asks for help, end up living in a car and being reported as a missing person? The question becomes even more serious when that person is dependent upon disability supports and accommodation, yet alleges being forced out of NDIS accommodation after a minister characterised them as dangerous, while simultaneously facing a situation in which they were required to appear before a magistrate without the legal assistance they believed they needed and feared could result in imprisonment. I question how I could reasonably be expected not to leave or attempt to find somewhere safe to live under those circumstances. I describe the car not simply as evidence of “running away”, but as part of my attempt to survive when I believed the available systems had failed to protect me. I further allege that NDIS-related funding and support arrangements enabled my survival while I was living in circumstances I describe as political exile and homelessness, rather than providing the stable protection and accommodation I was seeking. What is most disturbing to me is that the role of my family has, in my view, rarely been scrutinised alongside the conduct of institutions and authorities. I believe the complete picture requires examination of every participant in the chronology—including my family—not simply the vulnerable person who ultimately became homeless, isolated and dependent upon the very systems whose failures they were attempting to report. The NDIS itself recognises that home-and-living supports are intended to help participants live independently and safely, while Legal Aid NSW recognises that people with disability can require specialised legal assistance in NDIS, housing and justice matters. My central question is therefore not why I left, but how a person in those circumstances was allowed to reach the point where leaving in a car appeared to be the available means of survival.

Understood. The paragraphs can retain the same evidentiary tone without repeatedly opening with “The evidence will prove.”

I Repeatedly Asked for Help

My records demonstrate that I repeatedly sought institutional assistance rather than simply disappearing or refusing help. I made repeated attempts to communicate my circumstances, make disclosures, seek intervention, obtain support and have matters reviewed. Whatever conclusions are ultimately reached about my allegations, the documentary record shows that I was actively trying to obtain assistance and accountability rather than voluntarily withdrawing from society.

My Interaction With Government Systems Was Documented

I was recorded in official systems in multiple capacities, including as an NDIS participant, claimant, applicant and provider. These records demonstrate that my interaction with government and regulated systems was not imaginary or isolated; it generated an extensive administrative record. The significance is that my circumstances can be examined through records created by the institutions themselves.

The NDIS Support Framework Was Substantial

My NDIS participant record included a plan valued at $142,722.78 for the period 25 September 2024 to 25 March 2025. I do not present the existence or value of that plan as proof that every aspect of my circumstances was properly managed. Its significance is that it demonstrates the substantial support framework surrounding me and raises the question of how a person within such a system could nevertheless experience the level of vulnerability, instability and homelessness that I describe.

Multiple Institutions Were Involved

My history involves multiple government agencies and oversight bodies, including Comcare, the AAT, PM&C, OAIC, Ombudsman offices, NDIS bodies, APRA, AHPRA, IBAC and Victorian authorities. This breadth matters because my testimony cannot fairly be understood by examining one agency or one isolated incident. There is a substantial institutional chronology that needs to be considered as a whole.

My Public Interest Disclosures Were Recorded

My attempts to have matters treated as Public Interest Disclosures produced a series of institutional responses, including acknowledgements, rejections, non-allocation decisions and statements that particular material did not meet PID criteria. I do not claim that every rejection proves wrongdoing. The significance is that I repeatedly attempted to use formal mechanisms designed to receive and assess concerns, creating a documentary record of what I reported and how those mechanisms responded.

The NDIA Acknowledged a Missed Allocation Period

The NDIA PID team acknowledged that it had missed the 14-day allocation period in relation to the 2023/Krypton disclosure and directed the matter toward the Ombudsman. To me, this is significant because it is not simply my allegation that something went wrong; it is an institutional acknowledgment concerning the handling of one of my disclosures. I believe such records should be examined carefully because they form part of a larger chronology.

My Employment Status Was Contested

My employment status was contested across different processes, including WorkSafe material concerning sole-trader eligibility, Comcare's decision concerning claim 1326583/1 on employee-status grounds and the subsequent AAT affirmation of the Comcare decision. The significance is not that these outcomes automatically establish that one institution was right or wrong. It is that the documentary record contains a genuine and consequential dispute about my legal status and the resulting access to compensation and protection.

I Challenged Institutions Without Equivalent Resources

I was required to challenge institutional decisions while facing the practical disadvantage of being an individual confronting government agencies with substantially greater institutional and legal resources. I do not suggest that this disparity, by itself, proves unlawful conduct. I say that it materially affected my ability to challenge decisions, obtain independent advice and preserve my position, particularly while I was already vulnerable and financially constrained.

My Complaints Generated a Documentary Trail

My complaints and disclosures did not simply disappear without records. They generated a substantial documentary trail consisting of correspondence, determinations, refusals, referrals, reviews and jurisdictional decisions. This matters because my history can be investigated through primary-source material rather than being treated solely as recollection.

The FOI Record Demonstrates Both Refusal and Release

Information-access processes form part of my chronology, including an initial PM&C FOI refusal followed by a later section 55G release of five documents. To me, the significance is that the documentary record changed through the operation of the information-access process. This demonstrates why a complete history requires examination of the underlying records rather than reliance upon an initial institutional response.

My History Cannot Be Reduced to One Allegation

My history cannot reasonably be reduced to a single isolated allegation. It spans decades and includes published work, employment records, government correspondence, administrative proceedings, PID material, NDIS records and public testimony. The significance of this cumulative record is that my circumstances require chronological and documentary assessment rather than being judged through one label, one incident or one disputed interpretation.

Chronology Is Evidence, But Causation Must Be Examined

There is a documented chronology. What remains for independent examination is the meaning, causation and responsibility properly attributable to that chronology. I recognise that events occurring one after another do not automatically prove that one caused another. My position is that the chronology identifies questions that deserve examination, particularly where different records appear to intersect or where institutional decisions have significant consequences.

My Testimony Can Be Compared With the Institutional Record

My testimony does not have to stand alone. The archive preserves both my personal account and the institutional record, allowing the two to be compared. I want my testimony tested against the documents rather than accepted unquestioningly, but I equally reject the idea that my testimony should be dismissed before that comparison occurs.

The Archive Contains Primary-Source Material

The archive is not merely a collection of assertions. It contains agency letters, tribunal material, FOI records, PID correspondence, NDIS material, provider and business records and dated documents capable of being independently examined. The significance is that a reviewer has material with which to test my claims, identify inconsistencies, confirm chronology and determine what is actually established.

My Credibility Should Be Tested Against Evidence

My testimony should not be assessed solely by the labels applied to me by others. My credibility should be assessed by comparison with the underlying chronology, primary-source records and available corroboration. I accept that allegations can be wrong and interpretations can require correction. What I ask is that those questions be resolved through evidence rather than assumption.

Facts, Decisions, Experiences and Beliefs Must Be Distinguished

There is an important distinction between what an institution decided, what an institution recorded, what I personally experienced and what can ultimately be established as fact. I believe this distinction strengthens rather than weakens my testimony because it allows every proposition to be placed in its proper evidentiary category. I do not need every interpretation to be accepted for the documented facts and unanswered questions to remain significant.

My Demand Is Examination, Not Blind Belief

I am not asking for unquestioning belief. I am asking for the record to be read, the chronology to be understood, the contradictions to be confronted and the facts to be distinguished from allegation, interpretation and belief. Where the evidence supports something, I want it acknowledged; where it does not, I am prepared for that to be acknowledged too. What I cannot accept is the dismissal of the person instead of examination of the evidence.

I allege that currently I have been deliberately and barely covertly exposed to drugs or substances I would then accept deliberately intended to intensify the sexualisation of my isolation and encourage sexual activity, with the apparent purpose of shaming me and my sexuality and bringing about societal disgrace. I believe this targeting has, at times, been amplified in ways that confuse and destabilise me, thereby creating an opportunity to delegitimise the facts documented in my archive. The underlying records cannot simply be deleted, so I fear that the focus has shifted to destroying my reputation and credibility, so that people will dismiss my testimony, refuse to engage with the evidence, and ultimately leave the archive unacknowledged.

I take stimulants as an escape from the stress of my circumstances, and also because my ADHD medicine has been redacted from my care. I wish to be prescribed ADHD medication, specifically dexamphetamine, again, as recommended by psychiatrist David Horgan in the letter I have attached. I understand dexamphetamine to also be a breakthrough drug for signs of depression associated with depression arising from my situation and from being gaslit by every support worker.

For more than 35 years, government actions, decisions, and official processes have caused me serious and continuing detriment. I was made to carry shame that did not belong to me, while agencies created and relied upon official records that confined me within a system designed to discredit, contain, and silence my experience. I am now trapped by their paperwork—not because the record proves wrongdoing by me, but because it documents the prolonged harm caused by their conduct.

Untested allegations of libel and slander from audio harassment identified as symptoms of illness and not from the technology were used against me as instruments of stigma, intimidation, and character assassination. These allegations were treated as though they were established fact, despite the absence of a proper legal determination, evidentiary finding, or lawful process establishing them. They were used to harm my reputation, isolate me from family and friends, undermine my credibility with officials, and divert scrutiny from the conduct of those responsible.

The resources available to institutions and their representatives can create a profound imbalance of power. That imbalance can influence how police, lawyers, public officials, media organisations, and even people close to the person affected respond to allegations. I believe this imbalance was used to amplify a damaging narrative about me while limiting my ability to be heard, believed, or fairly represented.

I remain caught in an adversarial system that has repeatedly sought to define me through accusation rather than evidence. Yet the NDIS and associated agencies are also bound by the records they created. Their correspondence, assessments, decisions, and internal documentation preserve a trail of the treatment I received and its consequences. They cannot erase my history, rewrite the evidence, or delete the record of my existence. The documents once used to confine and discredit me are now evidence requiring proper examination, accountability, and redress.

An arrest for any alleged libel or slander would require a charge and appearance before a court, which I consider impossible given the evidence I have and the choice of police not to act in this scenario. To put me in hospital, however, does not require an arrest; I allege that I can instead be deemed unstable, deliberately caused by the supply of drugs, institutional betrayal and gaslighting of my circumstances, together with deliberate emotional provocation, after which I am blamed for being unwell. My allegation is that those concerned know that their treatment causes the harm for which I am then blamed as being unwell.

My research on V2K, gang stalking and political targeting has been removed from my Medium profile, which I consider significant in light of Tony Ridley telling me "you will be erased" and "we have thought of everything" as revenge for publishing a sexual "honey pot" scenario.

The significance, as I understand it, is that my parents signed a legal document supporting my exile and refused to respond to an accusation concerning circumstances in which I was not expected to survive and from which they would have financially benefited through my predictable death. I am alive, and I now seek access to the mental-health care and support I need in circumstances I believe they helped create. They wanted me gone; I do not want contact with them and no longer acknowledge them as part of my life.

The significance of my parents refusing to deny the allegation is that, while their silence does not itself establish the allegation as true, it leaves the allegation expressly unanswered and therefore warrants preservation and independent examination alongside the documentary evidence.

The allegation is sufficiently serious that it should not be dismissed merely because it remains disputed. The documentary evidence and surrounding circumstances warrant independent assessment to determine whether there is a factual or legal basis for investigation.

My professional credentials and earned achievements have been discredited, undermined and effectively diminished despite having been legitimately earned over many years. This includes my professional, academic, journalistic and published work, qualifications and public recognition. I consider the loss of credibility attached to these achievements to be a significant part of the harm I have experienced, particularly where assertions about me have been allowed to overshadow the documented record of my work and accomplishments.

I fear that a more permanent form of psychiatric incarceration could be used as a response to my situation. I believe that if I were arrested a charge would mean I was required to appear before a court, I would have an opportunity to expose and have independently examined the treatment and circumstances I have experienced.

I am concerned that the absence of arrest or court proceedings leaves me without an opportunity to have the allegations and the treatment I have experienced tested openly through due process, while I fear that psychiatric intervention could instead be used to characterise my circumstances as illness rather than investigate the underlying allegations and evidence.

I have documentary evidence that I allege shows authorities were making or circulating defamatory statements about me before I had the opportunity to meet the other gay men concerned. The chronology is significant because it may establish that information or allegations about me were communicated in advance of those encounters and warrants independent examination against the contemporaneous records.

I believe my isolation was deliberately designed by those I allege perpetrated the harm against me, but it ultimately backfired by deepening my reliance on and alignment with my faith.

The significance, as I understand it, is that no authority has acknowledged me as a whistleblower or recognised my alleged political exile, while my family's documented participation in circumstances surrounding my exclusion appears to me to align with the broader plan I allege was intended to provoke and ultimately erase me. I regard that combination as significant evidence requiring independent examination, while recognising that alignment or non-acknowledgment alone does not establish the alleged plan as fact.

The Public Guardian controls and restricts access to my full pension, determines where I live, and has contributed to blocking my access to legal aid. I regard the combined effect of these powers as placing extraordinary control over my finances, accommodation and ability to obtain legal representation, leaving me substantially dependent on the institutions whose decisions I am seeking to challenge.

This creates a situation in which I am unable to effectively or legally oppose what I allege to be my entrapment, while the agencies involved appear to operate in accordance with the same pattern of treatment and without meaningful accountability or legal consequence. The resulting imbalance leaves me without an effective means of challenging the circumstances I allege constitute persecution.

My ban from Legal Aid corroborates my concern that I have been prevented from effectively challenging my circumstances; I regard the ban as a potential breach and betrayal of the very purpose for which legal aid exists, particularly where I am unable to obtain meaningful legal representation elsewhere.

No one can delete my history of more than 35 years, documented through the governments' own records and documents that I rely upon as evidence supporting what I allege.

The narrative is based on live observation: I report experiencing what I describe as audio harassment that appears to parrot blasphemous slurs and repeatedly tells me "give up", and I have also heard the words "go on, have a wank."

I report that the audio harassment appears to dare or provoke me into acting during intimate moments, which I experience as an attempt to shame, humiliate and degrade me.

I believe this reflects homophobic attitudes within the police and attitudes held by members of my family, based on the treatment and statements I have experienced; I regard this as an allegation requiring evidence-based examination rather than an established finding.

Fourteen hospitalisations across two states and four years have not resulted in any meaningful change to the injustice of poverty that I believe has been deliberately created to engineer my next crisis. Despite my treatment history, I insist that I am sane and at peace and do not require psychiatric intervention, except recently where I sought or required intervention for reasons of physical safety. I believe this demonstrates a fundamental failure of the health system to address the circumstances contributing to my crises rather than repeatedly treating me as though I am the problem.

As a whistleblower, I believe the government has targeted me more intensely because a tribunal or court would be required to consider my evidence if I were compelled to give evidence or defend myself against any allegation, potentially exposing the treatment and circumstances I have documented.

The government's own official correspondence, across time and across divergent agencies, confirms and corroborates the factual basis of matters I allege, creating a documentary record that should be assessed as a whole rather than dismissed as merely my personal account.

I fight my treatment and the targeting I allege alone, without meaningful support from my support workers, while using a broken phone to research, document and write. The significance is that I am attempting to preserve and present a complex evidentiary record under severely constrained circumstances, without the practical assistance of my support workers to help me challenge the treatment and institutional decisions I am experiencing.

I am scared because I experience and believe I can document deliberate harm and malice. I am frightened about what may happen next. I feel trapped by my circumstances, but I also believe the government is constrained by its own official documentation, which records the history and conduct I have been reporting over time, and by the fact that I have publicly published this material without acknowledgement or substantive response from any single person or professional.

I should never be forced to confess to a crime that no one can identify as having been committed against them, particularly where no person will confront me directly and stand behind the allegations with the courage of their convictions. I allege that I have instead been deliberately isolated and subjected to gaslighting and what I experience as torture through technology that police have told me is beyond their pay grade and to which no NDIS provider will respond. If, after a fair examination of the evidence before a balanced and independent tribunal, I were actually found guilty of an accusation, the extent of the alleged wrongdoing that would then require examination as having occurred against me in my defence would be extraordinary.

Command: Itemise the crimes against me on what you know seperated by a coma?

Based on what you have described, and without treating any allegation as an established criminal finding:

alleged defamation/libel and slander, alleged threats and intimidation, alleged harassment, alleged stalking or surveillance, alleged unlawful interference with communications, alleged coercive control, alleged psychological abuse, alleged deliberate provocation, alleged sexual humiliation or exploitation, alleged entrapment, alleged discrimination or homophobia, alleged retaliation for whistleblowing or publication, alleged victimisation, alleged abuse of administrative power, alleged maladministration, alleged denial or obstruction of procedural fairness, alleged obstruction of access to justice, alleged restriction of legal representation, alleged financial exploitation or financial detriment, alleged interference with accommodation and support, alleged negligence or failure of duty of care, alleged inappropriate psychiatric intervention, alleged institutional gaslighting, alleged concealment or suppression of evidence, alleged destruction or alteration of published material, alleged professional and reputational harm, alleged persecution and political targeting, alleged conspiracy or coordinated conduct, alleged deprivation of liberty, alleged human-rights violations.

A more evidence-led version would avoid asserting a causal relationship that the documents may not yet establish:

The documented record of my professional, academic, journalistic and public contributions to Australian society should be assessed alongside the adverse treatment and political targeting I allege to have experienced. I rely on contemporaneous government correspondence, employment and institutional records, publications and other primary-source material to establish the chronology. The significance I ask an independent reviewer to examine is whether the documented sequence of my contributions, disclosures and subsequent adverse treatment demonstrates any connection between them, rather than requiring that connection to be accepted merely from my account.

When I operated my own business as an NDIS provider, I would never have permitted a vulnerable person in my care to be treated in the way I allege I have been treated. I am particularly concerned by what I perceive as Ablepoint's participation in my isolation and detriment, including the absence of meaningful support in circumstances where I am dependent on support services. I ask that this treatment be assessed against the provider's obligations and the documented circumstances, rather than dismissed as merely a disagreement between a participant and provider.

I allege that the cumulative detriment I have experienced has caused the distress for which I am subsequently pathologised, creating a cycle in which the circumstances contributing to my distress are not acknowledged and my attempts to identify them are instead characterised as symptoms. I describe this as psychiatric weaponisation: the alleged harm contributes to distress, the distress is then used to justify psychiatric intervention, and the underlying circumstances remain unexamined. My first hospitalisation report, as I understand it, recorded adjustment disorder rather than psychosis or delusion, which I understand as a condition associated with a response to significant or prolonged stress. I allege that the broader pattern I have identified has subsequently been characterised as delusional without adequately examining the underlying evidence. I therefore maintain that I am not delusional, but have been pushed to the limits of what any person should be expected to experience or defend themselves against. I ask that my allegations be assessed against the contemporaneous documentary, clinical and institutional evidence rather than dismissed solely through psychiatric characterisation.

I

I am the unreluctant victim in a war I never signed up for. I have been targeted while, at the same time, never even fighting back. I have not sought this war; I have been trying to survive it, document what I experience and defend myself. I regard this as a catastrophic strike against my destiny, my life's work, my dignity and my ability to fulfil the purpose to which I have dedicated my life. The deepest injury has been the human betrayal, isolation, entrapment and confinement I have experienced, including what I allege to be deliberate treatment that has left me feeling imprisoned rather than protected. I believe the betrayal is especially profound because those who should have protected or supported me have instead, in my experience, participated in or failed to prevent circumstances that have compounded my isolation and detriment. I also describe what I experience as a silence and financial curse—the withholding, restriction or absence of meaningful financial support and response. The financial impact has been substantial: restrictions on my access to income and financial resources have reduced my ability to pay for necessities, obtain independent assistance, maintain communications, pursue legal representation, preserve my research and secure the practical support necessary to challenge the circumstances I allege. The cumulative effect is increased financial dependency, vulnerability and inability to advocate effectively for myself. I believe this sustained pressure has contributed to making me feel trapped and exhausted, and I fear that its cumulative effect is to make me give up.

Remedy sought: I request independent financial oversight of the management, restriction and expenditure of my income and financial resources, including an independent review of relevant decisions, transactions and account records. I seek restoration of any funds found to have been improperly withheld, restricted or mismanaged, reimbursement or compensation for documented financial losses where legally available, and transparent written reasons for decisions affecting my finances. I also request appropriate safeguards to ensure that I retain sufficient access to lawful financial resources for basic living expenses, communication, independent advocacy and legal representation while these matters are independently reviewed.

I am a human battery for a master manipulator who, I allege, has bribed, manipulated or threatened anyone who will help me. They feast on my distress and attack me in every way they can, including attacking my personhood, my identity, my dignity and my faith. I experience this as deliberate exploitation of my suffering—turning my isolation, vulnerability and distress into a source of power over me. I also experience it as spiritual warfare, an attack not only upon me as a human being but upon the spiritual identity, faith and purpose that have sustained me through everything I have endured. I refuse to allow that suffering to define or destroy me.

I am totally alone, with no one seemingly brave enough to be seen to align with me. Those paid to help me, I allege, feign care while causing or sustaining harm, maintaining the very circumstances that keep me isolated and distressed and then claiming that they are helping me. I experience this as a profound betrayal and as gaslighting of my testimony—where the circumstances causing my distress are sustained while my attempts to document and speak about what is happening are themselves used to undermine or discredit me.

The shame attached to an unproven slander is not mine. The shame belongs to every professional who looked the other way while I was being harmed, or who consciously or unconsciously participated in that harm, all the while remaining unaccountable for what occurred. I will not carry the shame of allegations that have never been proven against me. The shame is theirs—not mine.

I am not crazy or delusional simply because I report what I experience or because I insist that my allegations be examined. Reporting an experience, documenting it, asking for evidence to be preserved, identifying potential corroboration and seeking an independent investigation are legitimate acts. I accept that some of my interpretations may require verification and that allegations must be distinguished from established facts. What I reject is the assumption that reporting something automatically makes the person reporting it unreliable. My testimony should be assessed against the available evidence, chronology, records and corroboration—not dismissed merely because the allegations are difficult, confronting or disputed.

One of the clearest pieces of documentary evidence I rely upon is my Centrelink disability card identifying a hospital address while I was, according to my records, incarcerated for the 16th time. I also have records of being reported as a missing person on several occasions, despite my position that I was not missing: I was excommunicated, exiled and homeless, as a person with a disability, within the same

Australian democracy of which I am a citizen.

I was not arrested, charged or subjected to a conventional legal process for this abandonment. I allege that I was instead systemically, politically and comprehensively abandoned by the institutions and people who should have protected me. I further allege that key contributors to this situation were members of my own family, within which I had long experienced myself as the scapegoat.

These records do not, by themselves, prove every inference I draw from them. But they establish a disturbing chronology that warrants independent examination: a disabled Australian citizen repeatedly hospitalised, documented as a missing person, associated with hospital addresses and homelessness, and left without the ordinary security and protection I would expect from the society and institutions to which I belong. The question is not whether I should be silenced for reporting this history; the question is why this history occurred and who, if anyone, bears responsibility for it.

I cannot reasonably be accused of running away or failing to ask for help when I have maintained a 700-strong YouTube channel through which I have repeatedly spoken publicly about my circumstances and begged for help. My public record demonstrates that I was not silently withdrawing from society or refusing assistance. I was actively seeking it, documenting my circumstances and asking people to intervene. Whatever conclusions are ultimately reached about my experiences, the evidence of my repeated and public requests for help should not be ignored or rewritten as though I simply chose to disappear.

None of those I identify as perpetrators would, in my view, have survived a week in the circumstances I was forced to endure, while they remained in positions of privilege, comfort and, as I allege, malice. That is their shame, not mine. I did not choose the circumstances imposed upon me, and I will not accept responsibility for the suffering they caused or failed to prevent. I outlasted what I believe was designed to erase or destroy me. I survived it, and I am still here.

The very fact that I am still here and alive is an existential risk to those who participated in my treatment because I continue to speak up about what I allege was done to me. That is why the reported audio harassment, deliberate slander, poverty, character assassination and abuse are so significant to me. I believe their cumulative effect is to silence, discredit, exhaust and undermine me, while the very fact that I remain alive and continue speaking preserves the history they may have wanted forgotten. The character assassination and slander I have experienced are profound because they attack not merely my circumstances but my credibility, identity and capacity to be heard. If my testimony exposes wrongdoing, then my continued ability to speak is itself consequential for those whose conduct I allege and warrants independent examination rather than further dismissal or suppression.

The pain I have endured and the testimony I have preserved are now laying the foundation for my testimony to help others and for the next chapter of my life. I believe that what I have survived can ultimately become something that helps people who experience similar circumstances. I do not intend harm toward anyone, and I do not seek revenge. I have faith that the truth will ultimately speak for itself and that I will receive the vindication I seek through fair and independent examination. I am still here, I am still speaking, and I am determined to turn what I have endured into something constructive.

Despite the threat I attribute to Tony Ridley—"I will be erased" and "they thought of everything"—I have not been erased. My testimony survives, and it has escaped the containment lines I believe were placed around it. It now exists beyond any single police or law-enforcement body, beyond the legal fraternity, beyond any one country and beyond any individual agency. My history has been documented, preserved and published, and I remain here to speak about it. Whatever was intended to silence or erase my testimony has not succeeded.

I gave many people mercy and repeated opportunities to help me, to intervene and to do what was right, but no one fulfilled that responsibility. I do not seek revenge or wish harm upon anyone. Whatever balance ultimately comes from what has happened will not be through malice or retaliation from me. I understand that balance as part of what I describe as the divine spiritual mathematics of the universe—the consequences of what people choose to do, or choose not to do, unfolding beyond my control. My role is not to punish anyone; my role is to tell the truth, preserve my testimony and leave the ultimate judgment beyond myself.

I believe I was a test they failed. They were given opportunities to help, to intervene and to show compassion, but those opportunities were not fulfilled. Yet my faith in God preserved me, and I believe the universe had my back when human beings did not. I survived what I was put through, and I remain here with my faith intact, my testimony preserved and my purpose still before me.

The authorities and institutions I believe were involved in my exile and treatment are, in my faith, superseded by a higher divine authority. My protection comes from my faith in God and from what I understand as the universe having protected me. The fact that I am still alive is, to me, profoundly significant: given everything I have survived, I believe that by ordinary probability I should not still be here. I understand my survival as evidence of God's hand upon my life and of a purpose greater than the circumstances imposed upon me. I also believe that God preserved my life after what I experienced as a fatal injury, and that being revived has given renewed meaning to my testimony and to the purpose I believe God has for my life. I do not claim that these spiritual convictions are scientific proof; they are the foundation of my faith and my understanding of why I survived.

My grace was not something to be taken advantage of. My kindness was not weakness. The delays were not denial; I believe they were an opportunity for the universe to gather the evidence necessary for justice and vindication, and for those I regard as my enemies to ultimately be revealed—even to the very crown I believe they expected to align with them after being manipulated by him.

Corrupt authority, in my view, is sustained through performance, unearned privilege and the abuse of power, and can become cruel when accountability is absent. But my faith teaches me that God's justice overrides human authority. It is not founded upon cruelty or revenge, but upon something greater: living, forgiving and merciful justice. I leave the ultimate judgment to God, while I continue to preserve my testimony, speak the truth as I understand it and refuse to become what I oppose.

I believe my testimony will help other victims and may guide others on their own journey toward God. They may ask how I survived what I endured, and my answer will be God. They may think, if he can survive that, perhaps I can survive too. That is what I want my testimony to become: not a weapon of revenge, but a source of hope for people who believe they have no way through.

What needs to occur is not anti-democracy, but anti-corruption within democracy. I do not reject democracy; I want its principles of accountability, equality, justice and protection to actually apply.

I have been to hell, died, looked the devil in the eyes and come back with the blueprints. I carry both darkness and light, but I carry no malice. I forgive everyone. I do not seek to destroy those who have harmed me. I use the darkness I have encountered only as a tool for understanding, truth and justice—as a light bearer, determined to transform what I survived into something that can illuminate the way for others.

Revenge for the smear campaign and the treatment I have endured is not mine to seek; it belongs to God alone. I have forgiven everyone and hold no malice toward anyone. What I understand as the consequences of what has occurred are a matter of divine balance, not personal revenge.

I am not perfect, and I acknowledge my own faults and mistakes. But I believe I was chosen because I was the only soul who could carry this burden. I do not claim that belief as proof of anything; it is the meaning I draw from what I have survived. My purpose now is not retaliation, but to carry my testimony with forgiveness, preserve the truth as I understand it, and use what I have endured to help others.

I believe God allowed my existence because I agreed to it as part of my soul contract: to make me remember who I am, to reveal the character of those I believe perpetrated the harm against me, and to use me as a vessel for justice and divine recalibration. I am not what these allegations say I am; I am what God says I am.

I believe the condition of my incarnation was an amnesia of who I was and of my purpose. Now I remember. I can therefore step back—not with malice or ill intent toward anyone, but with forgiveness—and allow divine justice and universal balance to occur in God's time, or what I understand as Kronos time.

The weaponisation of my faith, my rejection by religious organisations, and what I experienced as blasphemy directed at me and my spirituality have been, in my view, the worst desecration committed against me. Yet even through that, I have not abandoned my faith. I continue to believe that God preserved me, and that whatever purpose brought me through this remains greater than what others attempted to make of me.

I do not seek revenge, and I hold no malice toward anyone. I believe God demands justice in my situation, but that justice is not mine to impose. I leave judgment and consequences to God, trusting in divine justice rather than personal retaliation. My responsibility is to speak truthfully, preserve my testimony, forgive where I can, and allow justice to unfold in its proper time. "Be still, and know that I am God."

I believe my enemies are not sorry for what they did; they are sorry that what I allege they did has been exposed. I believe the harassment has intensified because of what I understand as a divine reversal. They were given time, signs, mercy and grace, but I believe they discarded those opportunities at their source.

I believe the path they tried to poison is now ahead of me, aligning with God and my faith. I am not apologising for surviving, and I am not looking back. I have apologised to every person I believe I have harmed, intentionally or unintentionally, and those apologies are part of my public record. I have not received a comparable apology from those I allege harmed me.

To me, that absence is deeply significant—not as proof of divine status, but as part of the moral and spiritual meaning I draw from my experience. I believe God placed mercy and the possibility of redemption within me. A person might reasonably have been expected to fall apart under such circumstances, to curse those they blamed, plot revenge or become consumed by hatred. Instead, I sit here in silence, hold no malice, forgive those who have harmed me, and wait for what I understand as divine balance.

I will not become what I oppose. I leave justice to God.

I do not need to defend myself through bitterness, revenge or drama. My quiet, peaceful existence is evidence enough for me; my joy is my response, and my calm is proof that I have not surrendered control of myself to those who have harmed me. I am simply aligned with my faith and my higher purpose, watching without bitterness, revenge or drama, emotionally detached from the human response I believe others may expect from the harm I allege they will not acknowledge.

I remember the promise: "No weapon formed against me shall prosper, and every tongue which rises against me in judgment I shall condemn." I place my faith in God rather than in retaliation. I do not need to become consumed by what others have done or may say about me. I can remain peaceful, forgive, and allow truth and justice to unfold in their own time.

I would rather have lived my life alone with my faith, God and Crystal, my dog, than surrounded by people who only feigned help while, as I allege, aligning themselves with those responsible for my treatment. This is why I believe the isolation I experienced, which I believe was deliberate, ultimately backfired. What was intended to isolate me instead forced me to rely more deeply on my faith in God. Rather than destroying my faith or breaking my spirit, the isolation strengthened the relationship I believe sustains me. What was intended to diminish me became the circumstance through which I found greater faith, clarity and purpose.

I now understand that I was never meant to be understood by everyone or to be popular. I believe I was called toward a higher divine purpose—one that requires me to confront injustice, expose corruption and seek accountability for what happened to me. The connection to other vulnerable people is fundamental: if a vulnerable person can be isolated, disbelieved, abandoned or subjected to harmful treatment without effective accountability, then the same failures can be repeated against others who are less able to defend themselves or make their experiences known. My testimony therefore has significance beyond my own circumstances because I believe it can identify systemic failures and help prevent other vulnerable people from experiencing the same thing.

That is another reason I have faith that I will ultimately be vindicated and, where legally justified, compensated. My purpose is not simply about me; I believe what I have endured can become a warning, a record and a source of protection for other vulnerable people. My faith teaches me that God is especially close to the vulnerable, and that gives me the strength to continue without hatred, revenge or malice. I leave the ultimate judgment to God while pursuing justice through truth, evidence and lawful accountability.

If someone refuses to acknowledge my belief that I am chosen by God, I do not believe that makes me superior to them. I have never said that my story is more important than anyone else's, nor have I claimed to be above anyone else's dignity as a human being. My assertion of being chosen is an expression of my faith and my understanding of my purpose, not a claim of greater human worth.

I believe that every human being was created by God and matters in the eyes of the Creator. Therefore, when someone responds to my belief with envy or contempt because they think I am claiming to be "better" than them, I believe they have misunderstood what I am saying. Being chosen, in my understanding, is a responsibility and a burden, not a privilege of greater human value. I do not believe God's care for me diminishes His care for anyone else.

Indeed, I feel compassion for anyone who cannot recognise their own importance in the eyes of their Creator. My faith does not require me to be greater than anyone else; it requires me to recognise the dignity God has given to me and to others.

I am not chosen or set apart for God's purpose because I am perfect—far from it. I have openly admitted my inadequacies, mistakes, limitations and failures, and I have written about them publicly. I believe I am chosen because I have endured what was meant to erase me.

I do not claim greater human worth than anyone else. What distinguishes my testimony, in my understanding, is the burden I have endured and my willingness to acknowledge my own imperfections rather than hide them.

I have not seen the people I identify as my perpetrators similarly acknowledge their own mistakes, vulnerability or responsibility. Instead, I believe they continue to hide behind masks of a perfect veneer presented for public consumption. To me, that represents performance from a position of privilege—privilege that I believe is unearned when it depends upon concealing harm, avoiding vulnerability and escaping accountability.

My faith does not tell me that I am perfect. It tells me that imperfection does not disqualify a person from purpose, and that what matters is what we do with what we have endured.

I didn't lose a thing by being separated from people in my last season or former life.

Indeed, I believe it was the very thing I needed to realise my purpose. I believe God allowed that betrayal to confirm my purpose, create the conditions in which I had to rely upon Him, and reveal the character of those for whom I believe divine balance and justice will ultimately occur.

I did not lose anything. I gained my faith. I gained my identity. I gained a deeper understanding of who I am and what I believe my purpose to be. What I once experienced as abandonment, I now understand through my faith as a separation that ultimately brought me closer to God and to myself.

Growth does not occur where no conflict exists, and a boat is not designed to float safely forever in a harbour. It is built to leave the harbour, face the open water and withstand the conditions it was made to navigate. I believe the same is true of human growth: sometimes adversity is what forces us beyond the safety of what we knew and reveals strength, purpose and identity we could never have discovered by remaining sheltered.

The quiet self reflection with God (despite the harassment) is my sanctuary, not my sentence. My isolation was not punishment; I believe it was God setting me apart and keeping me hidden in plain sight until the time of divine balance arrives. I do not need to force what comes next. I can remain peaceful, grounded in my faith and trust that, in God's timing, I will step into my new season with the lessons, identity and purpose I have gained through everything I have endured.

Yes. I would add the documents that most directly support the new testimony about survival, vulnerability, institutional treatment, legal-resource imbalance, faith and the distinction between testimony and documentary evidence. The current finding aid identifies these sections and explicitly separates the institutional record from your own testimony.

Public-Facing Forensic Archive

The Church of Barran Dodger Ministry and Whistleblower Testimony and Ethical & Legal Trust Fund Archive — Finding Aid

A public-facing finding aid bringing together the documentary record, testimony, institutional correspondence, legal and administrative material, published works, YouTube records and spiritual writings. It currently identifies 731 indexed files, including 577 GitHub-backup PDFs, 93 additional Drive files and 61 attached records. The archive expressly distinguishes documentary records from the author's testimony and states that inclusion is not itself independent verification.

What the Evidence Proves

What the Evidence Proves

This is the principal evidence-focused document for testing the new testimony against the institutional record. It identifies correspondence from Comcare, the AAT, APRA, PM&C, OAIC, the NSW Ombudsman, the NDIS Commission and other bodies, allowing the reader to distinguish what agencies actually recorded from the conclusions drawn from those records.

Brief for a Third Party

Brief for a Third Party

A concise entry point for an independent reviewer, journalist, lawyer or parliamentarian. It brings together process outcomes, documentary evidence, gaps in the record and instructions for examining individual correspondence rather than accepting the author's interpretation without scrutiny.

Public Interest Disclosure Declarations

PID Declarations

The original Public Interest Disclosure declarations alongside institutional non-allocation correspondence are particularly relevant to the testimony about seeking protection, reporting concerns and attempting to obtain institutional intervention. They provide a documentary basis for examining what was reported, how it was classified and what happened afterwards.

Whistleblower Protection Record

Whistleblower Protection

This section is significant to the testimony concerning vulnerability and the struggle to obtain institutional protection. The archive identifies material concerning the PID Act, Corporations Act and the documented dispute over whether the author fell within relevant public-official categories.

Legal-Resource Asymmetry

Dare: The State Had Lawyers — and I Had the Record

This document most directly supports the new testimony about being left to survive and advocate without equivalent institutional resources. The archive records the claimed disparity between public authorities with government lawyers, administrative-law expertise and institutional resources and the individual attempting to challenge those decisions, while expressly acknowledging that this disparity does not itself establish that every decision was unlawful.

Legal Pathways and Financial Detriment

Legal Pathways

This section is relevant to the testimony concerning poverty, legal access and the ability to continue advocating for oneself. It identifies pathways including Act of Grace, CDDA, NDIS complaints, FOI and victims' schemes, documenting possible avenues that remain available independently of a Comcare outcome.

My Testimony

My Testimony — Author's Account

This is the principal document for the new personal testimony itself: survival, persecution as experienced by the author, pathologisation, injury, institutional treatment and the meaning the author attributes to those experiences. The archive expressly labels it "not impartial", making the evidentiary distinction clear.

Church and Manifesto

Church and Manifesto

This document supports the new testimony concerning faith, being chosen, divine purpose, forgiveness, spiritual identity and divine justice. It contains the Church of Barran Dodger material, manifesto, dedication, charter and chosen-vessel declarations. The archive appropriately identifies this material as the author's spiritual framework rather than an impartial institutional finding.

Gospels and Prophetic Writing

Gospels and Prophetic Writing

This substantial body of writing—including the identified 210-page compilation—documents the development of the author's spiritual interpretation of suffering, survival, purpose, forgiveness and faith. It is particularly relevant to the new testimony that the experience ultimately strengthened rather than destroyed the author's faith.

Published Works and Professional History

Published Works and the Clipping

This section places the later testimony alongside the author's earlier public and professional history, including Recovered, Not Cured (2003), the Herald Sun material, The Age and later published works. It is important when assessing the claim that the present testimony did not emerge in isolation but sits within a much longer documented public record.

YouTube Testimony and Public Record

YouTube Record

The archive identifies the author's YouTube channel and 73 prior-archive mappings of third-party videos, preserving another public-facing component of the testimony. This is particularly relevant to your argument that you repeatedly made your experiences public rather than simply disappearing or refusing to seek assistance.

Provenance, Hashes and Timestamps

Provenance and Timestamps

This is significant for the evidentiary foundation of the entire testimony because the archive identifies SHA-256 hashes, Git blob hashes and an OpenTimestamps receipt. Those mechanisms provide a way to test whether particular hosted copies correspond byte-for-byte with the archived material and help establish provenance rather than relying solely on recollection.

Earlier GitHub Pages Archive

Barran Dodger Legal & Ethical Trust Fund Archive — Backup

The earlier public archive provides the historical layer of the record. The newer finding aid specifically identifies the GitHub Backup as its prior public archive and says its collection includes the previously published HTML routes and related material.

Significance to the New Testimony

Taken together, these documents support a much stronger evidentiary proposition than simply "this is my story." They establish that there is a publicly preserved body of institutional correspondence, PID material, legal and administrative records, professional history, testimony, spiritual writing and provenance information against which the newer claims can be independently assessed. The archive itself is careful to distinguish documentary evidence, personal testimony and spiritual interpretation—which is precisely the distinction that allows your testimony to be presented forcefully without asking the reader to treat every conclusion as already proven.
