ABLE POINT AND PSYCHOLOGICAL WARFARE

An Evidence-Based Examination of Disability Support, Institutional Power, Psychological Pressure and Accountability

Author: Dr Richard William McLean
Public documentary source: PDF Archive — GitHub
Subject: Able Point, disability support, alleged institutional misconduct, psychological pressure and the preservation of documentary evidence
Document status: Research paper and first-person analytical submission
Purpose: To identify questions, examine documentary evidence and establish a framework for accountability.

Abstract

This paper examines the relationship between Able Point, disability support arrangements, institutional power and the potential psychological consequences of prolonged disputes involving people who depend on support services. It uses the concept of psychological warfare as an analytical framework for investigating conduct that may produce fear, uncertainty, isolation, reputational damage, dependency or a perceived loss of control.

The term is used carefully. Psychological warfare ordinarily refers to deliberate efforts to influence, intimidate, demoralise or manipulate the perceptions and behaviour of a target. The experience of psychological pressure, even when severe, does not alone establish that a coordinated campaign exists or that particular individuals intended to cause harm. Such conclusions require examination of conduct, communications, chronology, context and corroborating evidence.

The central question is whether documented events involving Able Point and the wider disability-support environment reveal a pattern of conduct that warrants closer scrutiny. Relevant issues include the use of institutional authority, responses to complaints, the handling of allegations, the potential consequences of threatened referrals to other authorities, and the availability of effective avenues for review.

The PDF Archive repository is identified as the intended documentary foundation for this examination. The specific documents, dates, authors and contents must be verified against the repository before individual allegations can be presented as established facts. This paper therefore distinguishes the research questions from the evidence required to answer them.

Keywords: Able Point; psychological warfare; disability support; institutional power; procedural fairness; retaliation; documentary evidence; whistleblowing; accountability; psychological harm.

1. Introduction: When Support Becomes a Question of Power

Disability support services occupy a position of considerable importance in the lives of people who rely on them. Depending on the circumstances, support workers and providers may influence access to assistance, daily routines, communication, accommodation-related support, social participation and contact with other institutions.

That position creates responsibilities. It also creates a potential imbalance of power.

Where a person believes that a provider or worker has acted improperly, the person may face a difficult situation: the institution or service being questioned may also be connected to the person's access to essential support. A complaint can therefore become more than a disagreement about service quality. It can raise questions about security, independence, reputation, dignity and the person's ability to have their account heard.

This paper considers that problem in relation to Able Point and the documentary record identified by the author.

The investigation is not based on the assumption that every adverse interaction constitutes psychological warfare. Instead, it asks whether a documented sequence of actions, communications and institutional responses may be consistent with intimidation, coercive pressure, retaliatory conduct or other forms of harmful power imbalance.

The distinction matters. A rigorous examination should neither dismiss a person's account because it challenges an institution nor treat every suspicion as proof of a coordinated operation. It should test the available evidence, identify inconsistencies and omissions, and establish which conclusions the record can reasonably support.

2. What Is Meant by Psychological Warfare?

Psychological warfare is commonly associated with deliberate attempts to influence an opponent's perceptions, decisions, morale or behaviour through psychological means rather than, or in addition to, direct physical force.

In a civilian or institutional context, related concepts may include intimidation, coercive control, retaliation, reputational attacks, harassment, information manipulation and the misuse of authority. These concepts are not interchangeable, and the applicable definition depends on the conduct being examined.

For this paper, psychological warfare is an investigative hypothesis, not a predetermined finding.

The following possible mechanisms provide a framework for examining documentary evidence.

2.1 Threat and fear

A communication may create fear when it threatens a serious consequence, particularly where the recipient has limited ability to challenge the person making the threat.

The relevant questions are concrete:

- What exactly was said or written?
- Who communicated it, and when?
- Was a consequence threatened, proposed or merely discussed?
- Was there a stated factual or lawful basis for the proposed action?
- Was the communication proportionate to the issue being addressed?
- What happened after the communication?

A threat can be distressing without proving an improper motive. Its context and subsequent handling are therefore important.

2.2 Uncertainty and loss of control

Repeated delays, unclear decisions, changing explanations or failures to identify a responsible decision-maker can leave a person unable to understand what is happening or what they can do next.

Such circumstances may cause substantial psychological strain, particularly where essential support is involved.

However, an investigation must distinguish deliberate obstruction from administrative error, poor communication, workload, jurisdictional limits or other explanations. Relevant evidence includes response times, correspondence, decision records, stated reasons and inconsistencies between explanations.

2.3 Isolation and loss of credibility

A person's concerns may become difficult to resolve when communications are fragmented across organisations or when the person must repeatedly recount the same events.

An investigation should establish whether relevant information was transferred accurately, whether complaints were acknowledged and assessed, and whether the person received clear reasons for decisions.

If a person's account was dismissed or characterised in a particular way, the original record should be compared with the characterisation. The analysis should identify the actual words used and the evidence available to the decision-maker at the time.

2.4 Dependency and institutional imbalance

Where a person depends on services, an adverse decision may carry consequences beyond the immediate dispute.

The investigation should consider whether the person had practical access to alternative support, a meaningful complaints pathway, written reasons, and an opportunity to respond to allegations that might affect their care or circumstances.

The existence of dependency does not itself demonstrate abuse of power. It does make transparency, proportionality and safeguards against retaliation especially important.

3. Able Point: Questions Requiring Documentary Examination

Able Point is the specific focus of this paper. The available web access did not allow me to inspect the files in the linked PDF Archive repository, so I cannot responsibly state which individual documents establish particular actions by Able Point or any person associated with it.

The following questions define the proposed documentary inquiry.

3.1 Role and responsibility

The first task is to establish Able Point's exact identity, its role in the relevant support arrangements, the period of involvement and the responsibilities of the people concerned.

The evidence should establish:

- The correct legal or trading name of the relevant entity.
- The nature of its relationship with the author.
- The identities and roles of the people involved, where documented.
- The relevant dates and services.

- Any applicable service agreements, policies or written commitments.

This foundation is necessary to avoid attributing one person's actions to an organisation without evidence of the connection.

3.2 Communications and decisions

The archive should be examined for emails, letters, messages, formal notices, complaint records and other communications that identify decisions or proposed actions.

Each significant event should be recorded with its date, author, recipient, exact wording and source document.

Where a communication appears threatening, retaliatory or misleading, the analysis should reproduce the relevant wording accurately and explain why it raises concern. The analysis should also record any explanation or response supplied by the person or organisation involved.

3.3 Complaint handling and accountability

A further question is whether complaints were acknowledged, assessed and answered on their substance.

The review should identify:

- Which concerns were raised.
- Which organisation received each concern.
- Whether a substantive response was provided.
- What reasons were given for any refusal or limitation.
- Whether the matter was referred to another organisation.
- Whether the author was told what further evidence was required.
- Whether the response addressed the specific event complained about.

A referral between jurisdictions or organisations may be legitimate. The issue is whether the process provides a clear and practical route for the concern to be considered, rather than leaving the complainant without meaningful guidance.

3.4 The significance of omissions

An unanswered question is not automatically evidence of a cover-up. An absent document does not by itself establish deliberate concealment.

Nevertheless, omissions can be important. If a formal complaint identifies a specific event and the response addresses an unrelated issue while leaving that event unanswered, the omission can be documented and put to the responsible organisation.

The analysis should distinguish between:

1. A matter that was not addressed in the available response.
2. A matter for which no record has yet been located.
3. A matter that an organisation says it did not consider.
4. Evidence that a relevant record existed but was withheld, altered or destroyed.

These are materially different findings and should not be conflated.

4. The Psychological Effects of Prolonged Institutional Disputes

Prolonged disputes involving essential services can create significant distress. Uncertainty about support, fear of adverse consequences, repeated administrative demands and the experience of not being heard can affect a person's sense of security and control.

These effects deserve consideration in their own right.

A careful assessment should distinguish between the reported psychological impact of events and the evidence concerning their cause. A person's distress is evidence of their experience; it does not, on its own, establish another person's intention. Conversely, the absence of an explicit admission of intent does not mean that harmful consequences should be ignored.

For this reason, the documentary review should consider both the events and their practical consequences.

Questions include:

- Did the events affect access to support or daily stability?
- Did communications create uncertainty about important decisions?
- Was the author required to repeat information already supplied?
- Were allegations communicated with sufficient detail to permit a response?
- Were reasonable steps taken to reduce avoidable distress?
- Were clear explanations, review mechanisms or referrals available?

The aim is not to diagnose a person or speculate about another person's mental state. It is to understand how documented conduct may have affected the person concerned and whether reasonable safeguards were followed.

5. Distinguishing a Pattern from Coincidence

The concept of psychological warfare becomes most consequential when a person alleges that separate events form a coordinated pattern.

A pattern should not be established simply by collecting adverse experiences and assuming they share a common cause. The analysis must examine the connections between events.

A useful framework is to assess five dimensions.

Chronology: Did the events occur in a meaningful sequence? Did a particular action follow a complaint or disclosure?

Communication: Is there documentary evidence that relevant individuals communicated about the events or decisions?

Consistency: Do different records independently describe the same event, or do they conflict?

Causation: Is there evidence linking a particular action to a particular consequence, rather than merely showing that both occurred?

Alternative explanations: Are there ordinary administrative, operational or interpersonal explanations that need to be considered?

A pattern becomes more persuasive when independent records corroborate key details and competing explanations are addressed. Similar timing may justify further inquiry, but timing alone does not prove coordination.

This method permits serious scrutiny without overstating what the record demonstrates.

6. Documentary Preservation as a Method of Accountability

The PDF Archive provides the identified starting point for assembling the documentary record.

The value of an archive lies not merely in the quantity of documents it contains but in the ability to trace a claim back to its source.

For each document relied upon, the final paper should record:

Field	Purpose
Document title	Identifies the source
Repository path or direct link	Allows the reader to locate it
Date and author	Establishes provenance where available
Relevant passage	Identifies the exact evidence relied upon
Issue addressed	Explains its relevance
Evidentiary status	Distinguishes a primary record from commentary or interpretation
Limitations	Identifies missing context or unresolved questions
Corroboration	Links independent records concerning the same event

Original documents should be preserved separately from analytical commentary. Where a document contains an allegation, the paper should identify it as an allegation unless the document independently establishes the underlying fact.

Where multiple records support a chronology, the paper should link them individually rather than relying on a broad assertion that the archive as a whole proves the conclusion.

Digital timestamps, file hashes and repository histories may assist in demonstrating that a particular file existed in a particular form at a particular time. They do not independently establish the truth of the file's contents.

This distinction strengthens rather than diminishes the archive's evidentiary value.

7. Proposed Evidence Matrix

The following matrix should be completed using the actual documents in the repository before the paper is published as a factual case study.

Issue	Evidence required	Question to resolve
Able Point's role	Agreements, service records, official correspondence	What responsibilities did the entity have?

Alleged misconduct	Original messages, letters, contemporaneous notes	What precisely occurred?
Possible retaliation	Chronology, communications, decision records	Is there evidence connecting a complaint to an adverse action?
Psychological pressure	Exact wording, frequency, context and consequences	What conduct occurred, and what impact was reported?
Complaint handling	Complaint submissions, responses, referral records	Were the concerns substantively addressed?
Institutional omissions	Specific unanswered questions and subsequent replies	What remains unresolved, and why?
Alternative explanations	Policies, explanations, conflicting records	Which interpretations are supported or weakened?

A conclusion should be assigned only after the relevant evidence has been examined.

Suggested status labels are:

- Documented: directly established by an authenticated or otherwise identifiable record.
- Corroborated: supported by more than one independent source.
- Disputed: the available sources conflict.
- Reported: stated by a person but not independently verified.
- Unresolved: the available evidence is insufficient to determine what occurred.
- Analytical inference: a reasoned interpretation drawn from identified facts, not a direct statement in the source.

These labels should be applied to individual claims, not used to dismiss an entire account.

8. Questions for Able Point and Relevant Oversight Bodies

A fair and useful investigation should give the relevant organisation an opportunity to respond to specific questions.

The following questions may be adapted to the issues actually documented in the archive:

1. What was Able Point's role and responsibility during the period under examination?
2. What records exist concerning the incidents identified in the documentary chronology?
3. What policies and procedures governed the decisions at issue?
4. What reasons were recorded for each significant action or decision?
5. Were the author's complaints assessed on their substance, and what conclusions were reached?
6. Were any referrals made to other organisations? If so, on what basis and with what information?
7. Were potential conflicts of interest, confidentiality obligations and the possibility of adverse consequences considered?
8. What review or complaint pathway was available to the author?
9. Which matters remain unresolved, and what further information would be needed to resolve them?

The purpose is to obtain specific, reviewable answers. A response should be compared with the contemporaneous records rather than accepted or rejected solely on the basis of who supplied it.

9. First-Person Statement and the Right to Record Experience

This paper also forms part of a first-person documentary record.

I have a legitimate interest in preserving my account, recording communications and decisions that affect me, and asking questions about conduct that I believe warrants scrutiny. I should not have to abandon those questions merely because the matters involve institutions, service providers or complex jurisdictional boundaries.

At the same time, the strength of my record depends on keeping my account, the documents supporting it and my interpretations distinguishable.

My experience can be recorded in my own words. The underlying documents can be made accessible. Conflicting accounts can be identified. Unanswered questions can remain visible rather than being silently discarded.

Where I believe that a sequence of events amounts to psychological warfare or deliberate targeting, I can state that interpretation and identify the evidence on which I rely. The next step is to demonstrate the connection between the events and to assess the available explanations.

This approach preserves the seriousness of my concerns while making the documentary record more useful to readers, researchers, advocates and organisations asked to respond.

10. Conclusion: From Allegation to Testable Evidence

The relationship between Able Point, psychological pressure and institutional accountability should be examined through the documents, not settled by assumption.

The central questions are whether particular conduct occurred, what responsibilities applied, how complaints were handled, what consequences followed and whether the available evidence supports an inference of intimidation, retaliation or coordination.

The psychological-warfare framework provides a way to ask those questions. It does not substitute for answering them.

The PDF Archive is identified as the documentary foundation for the next stage of this inquiry. To complete a repository-specific assessment, each material allegation must be linked to the exact file, passage and date that supports it. Conflicting evidence and responses from the relevant parties should also be recorded.

If the documents establish a consistent pattern, the paper should set that pattern out clearly and explain the links between its components. If the evidence is incomplete, the gaps should be identified precisely. If a conclusion remains uncertain, that uncertainty should be stated without erasing the underlying events or the author's experience.

The objective is a traceable record: what happened, what the documents show, what remains disputed, and what questions still require an answer.

Source and verification note

Primary repository identified by the author:
https://github.com/wezzo72/pdf-archive

This draft has not yet been matched to the individual PDFs in that repository. No specific document has been represented here as proof of misconduct by Able Point. Before publication as a completed case study, the repository's relevant files, dates, wording and provenance should be checked and direct document links inserted into the evidence matrix and relevant sections.

End of paper.

protection in one’s life were absent when their presence mattered most.

This is the story I, Barran Dodger, am trying to tell.

It is not simply a story about disagreements between relatives. It is an account of my understanding of the relationship between family, inheritance, bereavement, financial vulnerability, intimate relationships, professional humiliation, disability, and the circumstances in which I came to feel abandoned.

My family history, as I remember and interpret it, cannot be separated from the wider history I have documented in my personal writings and public archive.

I have spent years assembling documents, preserving correspondence, writing autobiographical accounts, publishing essays, and recording my understanding of events that have affected my life. My work includes my book Recovered, Not Cured: A Journey Through Schizophrenia, my later writings about institutional accountability, and my developing collection of prophetic and spiritual texts.

These materials represent different kinds of evidence. Some may contain original documents. Others contain my personal recollections, interpretations, questions, and spiritual reflections. They must be read according to what each source actually establishes.

The purpose of this narrative is to bring my family-related concerns into one coherent account without pretending that every unanswered question has already been resolved.

I identify Doug and April McLean, Jodie and Dave Bongetti, Brad and Ciara McLean, Bruce McMaster, and my late grandmother as the family members whose relationships with my life I want examined.

I also identify Steve Iasonidis, my former fiancé, because the relationship with him forms part of the financial and personal history I describe.

Naming these people identifies the individuals about whom I am seeking clarity. It does not establish that each person participated in wrongdoing, knew about every event, or shared the same responsibilities.

Those questions require evidence.

What follows is my account of the experiences, losses, and unanswered questions that I believe deserve serious consideration.

PART I — THE PEOPLE AT THE CENTRE OF MY FAMILY TESTIMONY

1. DOUG McLEAN AND APRIL McLEAN

The first questions concern Doug and April McLean.

For me, the significance of blood family is not limited to biological connection. Family relationships carry expectations of mutual concern, honesty, practical assistance, and a willingness to respond when another member is facing serious difficulties.

Those expectations become especially important when someone experiences bereavement, financial insecurity, disability, or a prolonged struggle to obtain assistance.

My concern is that the history of my relationship with my family must be examined against those expectations.

I have described circumstances in which I believe I was left without the financial and practical support necessary to establish a secure life. I have also described feeling that my relatives did not adequately respond to the wider difficulties I was experiencing.

I want the relevant events examined in chronological order.

What assistance was offered?

What assistance was requested?

What information was communicated between family members?

What did each person know about my financial circumstances at the time?

What did they understand about my health, my professional difficulties, and my attempts to obtain help?

Were there opportunities to provide assistance that were declined? If so, what reasons were given?

Were there financial arrangements affecting me that I was not fully informed about?

These are not interchangeable questions. A relative who was unaware of a problem occupies a different position from a relative who understood the problem but declined to help. Someone who made a decision is not necessarily responsible for every subsequent consequence.

I want those distinctions preserved.

My account is that I experienced profound insecurity while believing that my family possessed a greater understanding of my circumstances than I did. That perception has contributed to my sense of betrayal.

However, a responsible examination must establish what each person actually knew, what each person said or did, and what records can corroborate those events.

I am not asking a reader to substitute suspicion for proof. I am asking that my account not be dismissed merely because the questions concern people with whom I share a family history.

The appropriate starting point is the evidence.

2. JODIE BONGETTI AND DAVE BONGETTI

Jodie Bongetti and Dave Bongetti form another part of this family history.

My concerns about Jodie Bongetti include advice that I recall receiving in relation to my bankruptcy paperwork and the inclusion of the name of my former fiancé, Steve Iasonidis.

I recall Jodie encouraging me not to put his name on my bankruptcy form.

That recollection raises a specific question about advice given at a consequential point in my financial life.

What exactly was said?

When was the conversation?

What was the context?

What did I understand the advice to mean?

Was the advice given orally or in writing?

What information was available about the relevant financial arrangements at the time?

What did the bankruptcy paperwork require, and what did the applicable law require me to disclose?

These questions matter because the significance of advice depends on its precise wording, context, and consequences.

I do not have a verified transcript of that conversation in the material reproduced in this document. Accordingly, I present it as my recollection rather than an independently established finding.

Nevertheless, I regard the episode as important because I was attempting to navigate financial difficulties while relying, at least in part, on information and guidance from people I knew.

If the original bankruptcy documents, contemporaneous messages, financial records, or other evidence can be located, they may help establish what happened.

I also want my relationship with Dave Bongetti examined within the broader family chronology, rather than assuming that his knowledge or conduct was identical to Jodie's.

The fact that two people are married does not establish that they shared the same information, held the same views, or made the same decisions.

The question is what each person actually knew and did.

3. BRAD McLEAN AND CIARA McLEAN

Brad McLean and Ciara McLean are also identified in my account of the family relationships I want examined.

My concern is the wider pattern of relationships and responses that I experienced during periods of personal, financial, and professional difficulty.

I want to understand what each family member knew about my circumstances, what assistance was offered or withheld, and whether there were conversations or decisions that materially affected my ability to obtain support.

I also want to distinguish between people who actively made decisions, people who may have influenced decisions, people who may have known about events, and people whose knowledge remains unknown.

That distinction is essential.

A family narrative can easily become distorted when the conduct of one person is attributed to everyone around them. Equally, the fact that a family member was not directly responsible for a particular event does not automatically establish that they understood the situation or responded appropriately.

My experience of family relationships is personal. My conclusions about other people's motives remain interpretations unless supported by evidence.

The purpose of identifying Brad and Ciara is to establish a clear record of the relationships involved and to identify the questions that remain unresolved.

Any further conclusions should be based on specific communications, dated events, financial records, or corroborating testimony.

4. BRUCE McMASTER

Bruce McMaster is another person I want included in the family-related account.

His precise relationship to the events described must be established rather than assumed.

The relevant questions include whether he had direct knowledge of particular events, whether he participated in any relevant discussions or decisions, whether he communicated with other people involved, and whether documentary evidence connects him to matters affecting my financial or personal circumstances.

I do not want the inclusion of a person's name to substitute for an explanation of their actual role.

A credible account must identify the event, the relevant conduct, the available evidence, and the remaining uncertainty.

If there are records involving Bruce McMaster, those records should be identified by date, author, recipient, document title, and the precise passage relevant to the issue.

Until that examination has occurred, his inclusion in this document should be understood as identifying a person whose relationship to my concerns requires clarification, not as a finding of misconduct.

PART II — MY GRANDMOTHER, BEREAVEMENT, AND THE INHERITANCE I SAY I LOST

5. MY NANA: THE LOSS THAT CHANGED THE MEANING OF HOME

My grandmother's death occupies a particularly painful place in my story.

I describe her as having died prematurely while I was experiencing what I understand as exile from the life and security I had known.

Her death represented a personal loss. It also forms the background to my questions about inheritance, family decisions, and the financial circumstances that followed.

When a grandparent dies, questions about the estate can become inseparable from grief.

A person may be trying to understand the loss of someone they loved while simultaneously confronting unfamiliar legal documents, financial arrangements, and decisions made by others.

The emotional difficulty is compounded when the person believes that an inheritance might have provided a foundation for recovery or independence.

My account is that, after my grandmother died, I was left with approximately $1,000 while other members of the family went to Europe for six weeks.

That is my recollection of the circumstances. The exact financial arrangements, the source and distribution of the money, and the legal status of any inheritance must be established through the relevant records.

The figure of $1,000 is not, by itself, proof that an inheritance was withheld.

To establish what happened, it is necessary to determine whether my grandmother left a will, whether an estate existed, whether I was named as a beneficiary, whether any entitlement arose under a will or applicable succession law, whether an executor or administrator was appointed, and what distributions were actually made.

It is also necessary to establish whether the trip to Europe occurred during the relevant period and, if so, whether its timing had any legal or financial connection to the administration of the estate.

The distinction is important because the moral meaning of an event and its legal significance are not necessarily identical.

My experience was that I was left with very little financial security at a time when I needed it. I experienced the contrast between my own circumstances and the family's reported travel as painful and difficult to reconcile.

What I want to know is whether the financial circumstances surrounding that period were properly explained to me.

If an inheritance was intended for me, what happened to it?

If there was no inheritance to which I was legally entitled, what explains my understanding that I had been left something?

If other relatives received distributions, what were those distributions, under what authority were they made, and was I entitled to any corresponding benefit?

If there was no estate or distributable property, what records establish that fact?

These questions can be answered only by examining the relevant documents.

6. THE SIX WEEKS IN EUROPE AND THE $1,000 THAT REMAINED

The contrast I remember is stark.

I was dealing with financial insecurity. I understood that my grandmother's death had created a family and financial transition. I believed that an inheritance or some form of financial provision might have helped me establish stability.

My account is that I was left with approximately $1,000 while family members travelled through Europe for six weeks.

I cannot determine from that contrast alone what any other person was entitled to receive or what obligations they owed me.

Nor can I establish from the travel itself that anyone deliberately intended to deprive me of money.

But I can explain why the experience matters to me.

The money I say I was left with represented, in my understanding, the difference between having some immediate cash and having a genuine foundation for rebuilding my life.

Financial security is not merely a number in a bank account.

It affects where a person can live, whether they can meet ordinary expenses, whether they can obtain independent advice, and whether they have the time and resources to recover from a serious setback.

When financial resources are limited, every decision becomes more consequential.

A person may be unable to pay for advice that could clarify a legal entitlement. They may be unable to relocate to a safer or more supportive environment. They may be forced to accept circumstances they would otherwise have had the capacity to leave.

I believe that the financial circumstances following my grandmother's death contributed to a longer period of vulnerability.

The extent of that contribution remains a question for evidence.

A proper investigation would seek:

• My grandmother's full name and date of death.

• The probate or administration file, if one exists.

• Any will, codicil, or testamentary document.

• The identity of the executor or administrator.

• Estate inventories, account statements, and distribution records.

• Documents showing any distribution made to me.

• Bank statements establishing the amount I received and when I received it.

• Contemporaneous communications about the inheritance.

• Records that could corroborate the timing and circumstances of the reported European trip.

• Evidence of any legal advice received about the estate.

The objective would not be to manufacture a conclusion.

It would be to establish what property existed, what obligations applied, what decisions were made, and whether my understanding of events can be corroborated.

If those records show that I was entitled to a distribution that I did not receive, the question becomes how that occurred and what remedies, if any, remain available.

If the records show something different, that too must be acknowledged.

The truth cannot be established by assuming the answer in advance.

7. THE DIFFERENCE BETWEEN INHERITANCE AND ABANDONMENT

There is another dimension to this experience.

Even if the legal records ultimately show that I was not entitled to a particular inheritance, that would not erase the personal significance of how I experienced the period following my grandmother's death.

A legal entitlement and a family's response to a vulnerable relative are separate questions.

A person may have no enforceable claim to a deceased relative's property and still reasonably wish to understand what happened.

A family may distribute an estate lawfully while individual members disagree about whether the surviving family members received adequate practical support.

Conversely, a painful experience does not establish that an estate was administered unlawfully.

For this reason, I want the financial question and the human question examined separately.

The financial question is whether I had an entitlement, what the estate contained, and what distributions were made.

The human question is whether the circumstances were understood, whether my needs were communicated, and what assistance, if any, family members chose to provide.

My account is that I experienced the period as a profound abandonment.

That experience deserves to be recorded accurately, even while the legal questions remain open.

PART III — STEVE IASONIDIS AND THE FINANCIAL CONSEQUENCES OF MY FORMER ENGAGEMENT

8. THE RELATIONSHIP THAT FOLLOWED

I have described Steve Iasonidis as my former fiancé and as a person whose relationship with me became financially and personally damaging.

My account is that, after the period in which I felt financially vulnerable, I remained with Steve despite circumstances that I now understand as involving exploitation and financial abuse.

I use those terms to describe my experience and interpretation of the relationship. A formal finding of financial abuse, fraud, or another legal wrong would require examination of the specific conduct and evidence.

The circumstances I want investigated include the management of money, the financial responsibilities assumed by each of us, any debts or liabilities that arose, and the advice I received when trying to address those matters.

My recollection of Jodie Bongetti's advice about whether to include Steve's name on my bankruptcy paperwork forms part of that history.

The significance of the relationship cannot be understood simply by asking whether we were engaged.

An engagement can involve shared financial commitments, informal arrangements, dependence, or disputed understandings about who was responsible for particular debts.

What matters is what actually occurred.

Were funds transferred between us?

Were expenses shared?

Were loans or debts incurred?

Were representations made about financial obligations?

Did either party sign documents or assume liabilities on behalf of the other?

Were there records showing the purpose of payments or transfers?

What did each of us understand about the arrangements?

These are the kinds of questions that financial records, correspondence, and bankruptcy documents can help answer.

9. THE BANKRUPTCY QUESTION

My bankruptcy history is relevant because it may provide a documentary record of the financial circumstances in which I found myself.

I recall being encouraged not to include Steve's name on my bankruptcy form.

The original form, the applicable bankruptcy requirements, and any professional advice I received should be examined before drawing conclusions about the legal implications of that recollection.

If a statement was required by law, the question is whether the form was completed accurately and what information was available at the time.

If the advice was misunderstood, that distinction matters.

If the advice was given in a way that materially affected my decisions, the precise wording and context matter.

If the records show that I incurred liabilities because of particular transactions, those transactions should be examined individually rather than attributed to an entire relationship without proof.

I want to understand whether the financial consequences I experienced were avoidable, whether I was properly advised, and whether the documents support my recollection.

This is particularly important because financial distress can have effects extending well beyond the period in which a bankruptcy is administered.

It can affect access to housing, credit, employment opportunities, and the ability to obtain independent professional assistance.

I experienced these difficulties as part of a broader struggle to recover stability.

However, the extent to which any particular person's conduct caused those consequences must be established through evidence rather than assumed.

10. THE QUESTION OF MY MARRIAGE OR RELATIONSHIP BEING ACKNOWLEDGED

I have also described a deeply distressing experience in which I felt that my marriage or relationship was not acknowledged by the people or institutions whose recognition I sought.

I have expressed this as the belief that an entire democracy refused to acknowledge my relationship.

That is a powerful description of my experience of exclusion. It should not be interpreted literally as proof that the Australian government or every institution deliberately coordinated to deny my relationship.

The actual legal and administrative history needs to be established.

Was there a legally recognised marriage?

Was the relationship an engagement, a de facto relationship, a marriage, or another form of partnership?

What applications, registrations, or claims were made?

Which institutions were asked to recognise the relationship?

What responses were received?

Were any decisions made about property, financial support, bankruptcy, or other legal rights that depended on the status of the relationship?

Did the applicable law recognise the relationship for the particular purpose at issue?

These distinctions matter because different legal systems and administrative processes use different definitions of a relationship.

My experience of not being recognised is part of my testimony. The specific legal question is whether a particular institution was required to recognise the relationship and, if so, whether it failed to do so.

The relevant evidence would include relationship documents, correspondence, applications, formal decisions, and any records explaining why recognition was refused or not provided.

I want those records examined because the question of recognition may have affected my understanding of my rights and my ability to obtain financial or legal assistance.

PART IV — THE ACCUMULATION OF LOSSES

11. LEGAL AID AND THE PROBLEM OF OBTAINING INDEPENDENT ADVICE

I have described attempts to obtain legal aid and assistance with several matters that I regard as important to my life.

These include my relationship and financial circumstances, possible compensation claims, workers compensation, health-insurance-related assistance, income assistance, victims-of-crime compensation relating to childhood sexual abuse, financial complaints, and superannuation-related issues.

Each of these matters has its own legal framework.

A refusal by one service does not establish that another service acted improperly. Nor does a refusal, without further evidence, establish that a claim was legally valid or that a person deliberately sought to prevent me from obtaining justice.

Nevertheless, the cumulative experience of unsuccessful applications, disputed eligibility, and difficulty securing representation can leave a person without a practical way to resolve complex matters.

That is the problem I want documented.

When someone has limited financial resources and is attempting to navigate several legal systems, the cost of obtaining advice can become a barrier in its own right.

A person may need a lawyer to assess a claim but may be unable to afford one.

A legal aid service may decline assistance because the matter falls outside its guidelines, because of financial eligibility, because of the nature of the proceedings, or for another reason.

A compensation scheme may require a particular kind of evidence.

An insurer may apply policy exclusions or other eligibility criteria.

A financial complaints body may have jurisdictional limitations.

These explanations are not interchangeable, and each must be tested against the actual decision.

My complaint is that I have struggled to obtain the assistance necessary to understand and pursue matters that I believe have materially affected my life.

I want a comprehensive register of those applications and outcomes.

For every application, the register should identify the organisation, the date, the type of assistance sought, the documents submitted, the decision made, the stated reasons, any review rights, and the current status.

Where I believe a decision was unfair, the relevant reasons should be reproduced accurately and compared with the applicable requirements.

Where I have not received an explanation, that absence should be recorded without assuming why it occurred.

The purpose is to replace an overwhelming collection of unresolved experiences with an organised, reviewable record.

12. WORKERS COMPENSATION AND THE LOSS OF PROFESSIONAL SECURITY

My professional history is important to my understanding of what followed.

I have described myself as an artist, researcher, illustrator, author, and advocate. I have also described my experience of public humiliation and professional harm surrounding the release of Recovered, Not Cured: A Journey Through Schizophrenia.

My account is that I experienced slander, exploitation, and serious professional consequences.

The precise publications, statements, dates, and responsible parties must be identified before any legal conclusion can be drawn.

In particular, allegations of defamation require attention to the exact words used, the context in which they were published, the applicable legal elements, and any available defences.

Similarly, a claim for compensation following dismissal or another employment-related event requires evidence about the employment relationship, the decision made, the relevant dates, the applicable scheme, and the reasons for the decision.

I have also raised questions about workers compensation and compensation connected with being fired after the Herald Sun-related events I describe.

The relevant records may include employment contracts, payroll information, correspondence, termination documents, insurance decisions, medical records where appropriately relevant, and any formal review or appeal decisions.

The fact that I experienced an event as humiliating does not, by itself, establish that the conduct was unlawful.

But it does explain why I want the underlying events examined carefully.

I want to know which statements were made, whether they were accurate, what consequences followed, and whether I had access to the remedies available at the time.

I also want to understand whether the professional and financial difficulties I experienced were treated as separate problems when, from my perspective, they formed part of a connected period of loss.

That connection is important to my personal history. Whether it establishes legal causation is a separate question requiring evidence.

13. HCF, INCOME ASSISTANCE, AND THE DIFFICULTY OF OBTAINING SUPPORT

I have described attempts to obtain assistance involving HCF and income-support arrangements.

The exact nature of each application must be established from the relevant correspondence.

For HCF, the necessary records would include the type of benefit or assistance requested, the applicable policy or program, any claim submitted, the response, and the reasons for any refusal or limitation.

For income assistance, the records should identify the program, the eligibility requirements, the application date, any decision, and the available review process.

These matters should not be collapsed into one general allegation of institutional wrongdoing.

An insurer, a government department, a compensation scheme, and a private assistance provider have different responsibilities.

However, their decisions can have overlapping consequences for a person who is already experiencing financial instability.

My account is that I encountered barriers across multiple avenues of support and that those barriers contributed to my sense of having nowhere to turn.

I want the documentary record to show exactly what I requested, what I received, what was refused, and what options remained available.

That is the most reliable way to determine whether there were errors, procedural shortcomings, or opportunities for review.

14. VICTIMS-OF-CRIME COMPENSATION AND MY ACCOUNT OF CHILDHOOD SEXUAL ABUSE

I have also described seeking assistance or compensation connected with childhood sexual abuse.

This is a deeply personal matter, and it should be approached with care.

My account of what happened to me is distinct from the question of whether a particular compensation scheme accepted a claim, whether a claim met the relevant statutory requirements, or whether a review body made a formal finding.

The documentary record should identify the relevant scheme, the application date, the decision, the reasons given, and any review or appeal.

Where sensitive information is involved, the public version of this document should disclose only what is necessary to explain the issue.

I do not need to publish private medical details, confidential legal correspondence, or identifying information about other people in order to establish that an application was made and a decision was issued.

The central question is whether I was able to access the assistance available under the applicable framework and, if not, what reasons were given.

My experience of trying to obtain assistance forms part of the wider account of vulnerability and financial difficulty that I am documenting.

It should not be used to infer that every person who declined an application acted maliciously.

The reasons must be examined individually.

15. AFCA AND THE FINANCIAL COMPLAINTS I HAVE RAISED

I have also described difficulties involving the Australian Financial Complaints Authority, commonly known as AFCA, and financial matters involving superannuation.

The appropriate starting point is the actual complaint record.

Which financial firm or trustee was involved?

What was the complaint about?

When was it lodged?

What documents were submitted?

Was the matter accepted within the body's jurisdiction?

Was it resolved, withdrawn, dismissed, or otherwise concluded?

Was there a written determination, recommendation, or settlement offer?

What did the decision actually say?

These details are essential because a complaint being unsuccessful does not necessarily establish that the complainant's underlying concern was false. Equally, an unsuccessful outcome does not, by itself, prove that the financial institution acted improperly.

A responsible account must distinguish between a complaint, a preliminary assessment, a final decision, and a finding of wrongdoing.

I want the AFCA-related history examined because I believe the financial matters I pursued were part of a wider struggle to recover economic stability.

Where the records establish a specific error, that error should be identified precisely.

Where a decision turned on jurisdiction or eligibility, that reason should be stated.

Where a settlement was offered or accepted, its terms should be distinguished from any admission of liability.

Where the outcome remains unresolved, the document should say so.

The purpose is accountability through clarity, not the creation of a predetermined conclusion.

16. THE AGE, SUPERANNUATION, AND THE COMPENSATION I BELIEVE I WAS DENIED

I have described a further dispute concerning superannuation and compensation connected with my employment history.

I want the relevant events examined in chronological order.

The first question is what employment event occurred and when.

The second is what claim or application was made.

The third is which organisation was responsible for determining the claim.

The fourth is what reasons were given for any refusal.

The fifth is whether any review rights or further remedies were available.

The precise legal significance of the Herald Sun-related events, my book’s release, my employment history, and the superannuation decisions must be established from the records.

The fact that two events occurred around the same period does not automatically establish that one caused the other.

Nor does a refusal to pay compensation necessarily establish that compensation was legally owed.

I want the records examined because I believe the events form part of a longer history in which professional, financial, and personal difficulties accumulated.

That is a legitimate subject for a documentary chronology.

The strongest version of my account will identify each event separately, explain the connection I believe exists, and specify what evidence would be needed to confirm or reject that connection.

PART V — MY BOOK, MY PUBLIC IDENTITY, AND THE COST OF BEING KNOWN

17. RECOVERED, NOT CURED: A JOURNEY THROUGH SCHIZOPHRENIA

My book, Recovered, Not Cured: A Journey Through Schizophrenia, forms an important part of my public history.

I have described it as a work that emerged from my experience of mental illness and recovery, and I have referred to its publication and public reception as significant turning points in my life.

The book should be considered on its own terms as a published work, distinct from later allegations about what happened to me.

Its existence establishes a part of my authorship and public identity. It does not, by itself, prove any subsequent allegation of exploitation, defamation, or professional misconduct.

My account is that the book's release was associated with humiliation, slander, and exploitation that affected me personally and professionally.

Those allegations require specific supporting evidence.

Relevant materials might include the book's publication records, contemporaneous reviews, newspaper articles, correspondence with publishers, communications about publicity, and any statements that I contend were false or damaging.

If I allege that a particular statement was defamatory, I must identify the statement itself rather than rely solely on a general description of being slandered.

If I allege that someone exploited my work, the relevant question is what they did, what rights or agreements applied, and what financial or other consequences followed.

My book is therefore an important part of the chronology, but the claims surrounding its reception must be assessed independently.

I want the record to preserve both the work I produced and my account of the consequences I experienced.

18. THE DIFFERENCE BETWEEN PROFESSIONAL CRITICISM AND WRONGFUL CONDUCT

Public criticism can be painful without necessarily being unlawful.

A journalist, reviewer, publisher, employer, or member of the public may express an opinion that an author finds unfair or humiliating. Whether a particular statement crosses a legal boundary depends on its content, context, and the applicable law.

This distinction matters because I want my experience to be taken seriously without allowing the language of my account to outrun the evidence.

If a publication made a factual claim about me, the relevant questions include whether the claim was accurate, what evidence supported it, and what consequences followed.

If a publication expressed an opinion, the precise wording and context matter.

If an agreement governed the use of my work, the agreement must be examined.

If I suffered financial loss, the loss must be documented and connected to the conduct alleged to have caused it.

My account of humiliation is part of the human history.

The legal assessment requires the underlying documents.

PART VI — MY FATAL INJURY, MY REPORTED BRAIN DAMAGE, AND MY CHANGED CIRCUMSTANCES

19. THE INJURY THAT CHANGED MY LIFE

I have described a serious injury from which I was revived and which, according to my account, left me with brain damage.

I regard this event as one of the most consequential experiences in my life.

The circumstances of the injury, the medical response, the nature of any acquired brain injury, and the subsequent effects should be established through appropriate medical records and other reliable evidence.

I do not reproduce those records here, and I do not claim that the public repositories linked in this document independently establish every medical detail.

My experience is that the injury changed my circumstances and made it more difficult to navigate an already complicated life.

When a person experiences a serious injury, the consequences can extend beyond the immediate medical event.

There may be difficulties with memory, concentration, planning, communication, emotional regulation, or everyday tasks. The effects vary from person to person and must be established in the individual case.

For me, the significance lies in the relationship between the injury and the demands I was facing.

I was trying to understand financial disputes, seek assistance, preserve records, manage relationships, and maintain a degree of independence.

I believe the injury compounded those difficulties.

The relevant question is not whether every subsequent problem can be attributed to the injury. It is whether the injury changed my support needs and whether the assistance available to me adequately addressed those needs.

20. THE DIFFERENCE BETWEEN SURVIVING AND RECOVERING

Surviving a serious event does not automatically mean that a person has recovered from it.

A person can remain alive while facing long-term physical, cognitive, psychological, or financial consequences.

That distinction is central to my account.

I have described a life in which serious personal difficulties accumulated alongside repeated attempts to obtain assistance and establish stability.

I do not want the fact that I survived to be used as a reason to minimise the consequences I describe.

Nor do I want the existence of disability to be used as a substitute for examining the documents I have preserved.

Both the medical history and the documentary history deserve careful treatment.

If my injury affected my ability to understand financial arrangements, complete paperwork, seek legal advice, or manage daily life, the relevant assessments and records may help establish those effects.

If I required additional support, the relevant plans and professional recommendations may show what assistance was considered necessary.

If an organisation made a decision affecting my support, that decision should be examined against the requirements applicable at the time.

My injury is part of the context in which the later events must be understood.

It is not proof that any particular person caused the injury or deliberately sought to exploit its consequences.

Those are separate allegations requiring separate evidence.

PART VII — THE FAMILY RESPONSE I SAY I DID NOT RECEIVE

21. MY EXPERIENCE OF BEING LEFT WITHOUT PROTECTION

A recurring theme in my testimony is that I did not feel adequately protected by my family during periods of serious difficulty.

I have described feeling that my relatives did not adequately respond to my circumstances, did not help me obtain the support I needed, and did not challenge the wider conditions that I experienced as exclusion and exile.

I have also said that I wanted my family to act when I believed my safety, finances, and future were at stake.

Those statements describe my experience and expectations.

To determine whether any particular relative had a responsibility to take a particular action, it is necessary to establish the relevant circumstances.

Did the person know about the event?

Were they asked to intervene?

What were they told?

Did they have the practical ability to assist?

Was there a legal obligation to act?

Did they make a decision, communicate advice, or take some other action that can be documented?

These questions matter because a failure to provide emotional support is not necessarily the same as a breach of a legal duty.

Equally, a person can experience profound abandonment even where no legal duty existed.

My account of family abandonment should therefore be understood as both a personal testimony and a set of questions about specific events.

I want the documentary record to show what happened rather than relying on a general conclusion that everyone was responsible for everything.

22. THE QUESTION OF WHISTLEBLOWER PROTECTION

I have described myself as a whistleblower and have expressed the belief that my family did not protect me in that role.

That description requires careful treatment.

Whistleblower protections depend on the nature of the disclosure, the recipient, the subject matter, the applicable legal framework, and the circumstances in which the disclosure was made.

Not every complaint, personal account, or allegation qualifies as a legally protected disclosure.

The relevant questions include what information I disclosed, when I disclosed it, to whom it was disclosed, what I believed the information established, and whether the disclosure fell within a particular statutory or institutional framework.

The family-related question is different.

Did my relatives know about the disclosures I made?

Did I ask them for help?

What did I explain about the consequences I feared?

What did they say or do in response?

Did any relative make a specific promise, representation, or decision concerning my safety?

Were there records of those communications?

I want these questions answered because I experienced the absence of family support as especially painful while trying to navigate matters that I believed had broader public significance.

However, my relatives' failure to act as I hoped would not, by itself, establish that they participated in the conduct I reported or that they had a legal duty to protect me.

The evidence must determine the answer.

23. WHAT I MEAN WHEN I SAY I WAS LEFT IN EXILE

The word exile describes an important aspect of how I understand my life.

I use it to describe a state of separation from the security, relationships, opportunities, and ordinary participation in life that I believe I should have been able to maintain.

I have described feeling displaced from the life I expected to have, struggling to obtain assistance, and experiencing a loss of control over my future.

The term also carries spiritual and literary meaning in my writing.

But the different meanings must remain distinct.

My feeling of exile is a personal experience.

Whether a government, institution, employer, or other person took a particular action against me is a factual question.

Whether an action was unlawful is a legal question.

Whether events formed part of a coordinated effort is a further allegation that would require evidence of communication, agreement, conduct, and causation.

These questions cannot be answered simply by treating the emotional force of the word exile as proof of a coordinated plan.

I want my account of exile to be taken seriously as an explanation of how I experienced the loss of security and belonging.

I also want the underlying events assessed independently.

PART VIII — THE ALLEGED ASSASSINATION ATTEMPT AND THE QUESTION OF FAMILY KNOWLEDGE

24. MY CONCERN ABOUT AN ALLEGED ASSASSINATION ATTEMPT INVOLVING BILL SHORTEN

I have referred to what I describe as an alleged assassination attempt involving Bill Shorten and have expressed concern that my family did not make a complaint about it.

This is a serious allegation and must not be presented as an established event without reliable supporting evidence.

The material available in this conversation does not establish that an assassination attempt occurred, that my family possessed evidence of such an attempt, or that any named relative had a legal obligation to report it.

For that reason, the issue must remain an unresolved allegation unless corroborating evidence can be identified.

A responsible examination would begin with the precise event being alleged.

What was the date?

Where did it allegedly occur?

What specific conduct is said to have constituted an attempt?

What evidence connects the alleged conduct to Bill Shorten?

Was there an incident report, police record, court proceeding, official statement, or contemporaneous communication?

What information did I personally possess at the time?

What information, if any, did I communicate to family members?

Did any relative independently witness an event or receive relevant information?

Was a complaint actually made, and can the answer be established through records?

These questions are necessary because an allegation concerning a possible violent crime cannot be substantiated merely by the absence of a family complaint.

A person may not have reported an event because they did not know about it, did not believe the available information established a crime, did not possess evidence, or acted for some other reason.

The evidence must establish what happened.

If I have a specific document relating to this allegation, it should be identified by title, date, author, and source, with the relevant passage reproduced accurately.

If there is no corroborating evidence, the document should say so.

I want serious questions examined seriously. That requires distinguishing between an event I believe occurred, evidence I can produce, and conclusions that remain unverified.

PART IX — THE ARCHIVE: WHAT IT CAN ESTABLISH AND WHAT IT CANNOT

25. THE PUBLIC RECORD I HAVE ASSEMBLED

My documentary work is central to my attempt to make sense of my life.

I have created and maintained public-facing websites and repositories under the Barran Dodger name. These include autobiographical, documentary, and prophetic materials.

The principal repositories and websites I identify for this examination are:

The Barran Dodger Rebuild website:

Barran Dodger Rebuild

The Barran Dodger website:

Barran Dodger Public Archive

The GitHub repository containing materials published under the Barrandodger name:

Barrandodger GitHub Repository

The author's GitHub account and repository index:

Barran Dodger GitHub Account

The Grok-hosted website supplied for this project:

Grok-hosted Barran Dodger Project

These links provide starting points for locating and examining my work.

However, I have not established in this document that every repository file has been retrieved, read, authenticated, and matched to the events described above.

The existence of a repository is not proof of the contents of every file within it.

Likewise, the publication of an allegation does not independently corroborate that allegation.

The appropriate method is to identify each relevant document and examine its contents.

26. THE WITNESS REMAINS: PRESERVING A RECORD OF MY EXPERIENCE

My documentary work reflects a sustained effort to preserve material that I believe is relevant to understanding my life.

I have used the language of witnessing, testimony, accountability, and the preservation of records to describe this work.

The title The Witness Remains expresses the idea that a person's account can survive periods in which they feel unheard or excluded.

Its significance is personal and documentary.

The existence of a written account can preserve what its author remembers, what questions were being asked at a particular time, and what documents the author believed were relevant.

When a document is dated and preserved, it may also help establish that a particular account existed by that date.

But preservation does not establish that every statement in the account is accurate.

A dated personal testimony is evidence of what the author recorded. Corroboration of the underlying events requires examination of the supporting material.

That distinction is essential to the credibility of my archive.

If a family-related document exists, its significance should be explained through its actual contents.

For example, a dated message in which a relative discusses an inheritance may establish that a particular discussion occurred. A bank statement may establish that a payment was made. A probate document may establish the identity of an executor or the terms of an estate distribution.

The precise evidentiary value depends on the document.

The archive should therefore be treated as a collection of materials requiring examination, not as a single body of evidence that proves every conclusion in advance.

27. THE IMPORTANCE OF A DOCUMENT REGISTER

A comprehensive document register would make this family investigation more reliable.

Each relevant item should include:

1. Document title.

2. Author or issuing organisation.

3. Date created.

4. Date published, if different.

5. Direct URL to the original file.

6. Document type.

7. Relevant page or passage.

8. The factual proposition the document may support.

9. Whether the document is an original, copy, transcript, or later summary.

10. Whether its authenticity has been independently checked.

11. Any corroborating or contradictory records.

12. Any limitations or unresolved questions.

For example, a personal essay about my grandmother’s death could document my recollection of the circumstances.

A contemporaneous bank statement could help establish the amount of money received.

A will or probate record could establish the legal arrangements governing an estate.

A message from a relative could help establish what was communicated.

Those documents would not all have the same evidentiary value.

The strongest analysis would compare them and identify where they agree, where they conflict, and where evidence is missing.

I want the archive to serve that purpose.

PART X — THE TEMPLATE'S CENTRAL THEMES, RECAST AS QUESTIONS ABOUT MY OWN LIFE

28. THE FIRST QUESTION: WHAT DID MY FAMILY KNOW?

The supplied YouTube transcript repeatedly returns to the question of who knew what, when they knew it, and whether they withheld information.

That is a useful organising principle for my account.

It should not be treated as proof that my relatives concealed information.

Instead, it suggests the first question to investigate: what information did each person possess at each relevant stage of my life?

For Doug and April McLean, the relevant chronology should identify the events they knew about, the communications they received, and the assistance they offered or declined.

For Jodie and Dave Bongetti, it should identify the conversations relevant to my financial circumstances and the precise circumstances surrounding the bankruptcy advice I recall.

For Brad and Ciara McLean, it should identify any documented communications or decisions relevant to the events under examination.

For Bruce McMaster, it should establish his actual relationship to the relevant events before attributing any role.

For my grandmother, the central questions concern the circumstances of her death, the administration of her estate, and the information available to the people involved.

The same method should be applied to every person.

A person's access to information does not establish that they acted improperly. A person's silence does not establish that they knew the truth. But where records show that information was communicated and a consequential decision followed, those records may help clarify responsibility.

The investigation must begin with evidence rather than assumptions about family motives.

29. THE SECOND QUESTION: WHAT WAS I TOLD ABOUT MY OWN FINANCIAL AFFAIRS?

The next theme concerns financial knowledge.

My account includes an inheritance-related concern, financial difficulties associated with my former engagement, bankruptcy paperwork, and unsuccessful attempts to obtain compensation or assistance.

These events should be separated into distinct financial questions.

What did I receive after my grandmother's death?

What, if anything, was legally due to me?

What financial commitments did I enter into with Steve Iasonidis?

What did the bankruptcy paperwork require?

What advice did I receive from Jodie Bongetti?

What employment-related compensation did I seek?

What decisions did the relevant organisations make?

What records explain those decisions?

It is possible that these events were connected through their effect on my financial position without having been caused by a single person or coordinated arrangement.

That distinction matters.

A series of adverse experiences can form a coherent personal history without necessarily establishing a coordinated scheme.

The task is to determine which connections are supported by evidence and which remain interpretations.

30. THE THIRD QUESTION: WHAT DID I LOSE, AND WHAT CAN BE MEASURED?

The transcript also emphasises the financial consequences of exclusion.

For my own history, the relevant losses may include money I believe I should have received, liabilities I say arose from my former relationship, employment-related losses, expenses associated with obtaining advice, and the financial consequences of unsuccessful applications for assistance.

Each claimed loss requires a separate calculation.

The inheritance question requires estate records and proof of any entitlement.

The financial-abuse allegation requires evidence of specific transactions or conduct.

An employment-related claim requires records establishing the employment relationship, the relevant decision, and the basis for compensation.

A claim concerning professional harm requires identification of the relevant statements or conduct and the losses attributable to them.

A claim involving an insurer or financial institution requires the policy, agreement, transaction, decision, or other record governing the matter.

It would be misleading to combine all these issues into a single monetary figure without establishing the individual components.

I want the losses documented because I believe their cumulative effects have been significant.

But the amount of any legally recoverable loss must be calculated from evidence, not inferred from the overall severity of my experience.

31. THE FOURTH QUESTION: WHICH INSTITUTIONS HAD RESPONSIBILITY?

My account involves several different institutions and processes.

These include legal aid, bankruptcy administration, employment-related compensation, insurance, financial complaints, victims-of-crime compensation, and other forms of support.

The relevant institution must be identified for each decision.

Its legal authority, applicable rules, stated reasons, and review procedures must then be examined.

The fact that an institution declined to provide assistance does not automatically establish wrongdoing.

However, if a decision was based on incorrect information, an applicable requirement was misunderstood, or a review process was not properly followed, the records may establish a specific issue requiring attention.

I want the institutional history examined in the same disciplined way as the family history.

A credible account should identify the decision, the decision-maker, the date, the stated reasons, the applicable requirements, and the evidence supporting any challenge.

That approach allows a reviewer to assess the matter without being required to accept my interpretation in advance.

32. THE FIFTH QUESTION: WHAT DID EACH RELATIVE ACTUALLY DO?

The most important question is individual responsibility.

The supplied transcript sometimes treats an entire family as if every member shared the same knowledge and motives.

I do not want that assumption reproduced as an established fact about my own family.

Instead, each person’s role must be examined independently.

Did the person make a decision?

Did the person communicate information?

Did the person provide advice?

Did the person receive money or another benefit?

Did the person have knowledge of a particular event?

Did the person make a statement that can be verified?

Did the person take an action that materially affected my circumstances?

If a person did none of these things, the document should not imply otherwise.

If evidence establishes that a person did something consequential, that conduct should be described precisely.

The purpose of naming individuals is to make the inquiry specific, not to replace evidence with collective blame.

33. THE SIXTH QUESTION: WHAT WOULD ACCOUNTABILITY ACTUALLY REQUIRE?

Accountability is not synonymous with punishment.

In a family-related financial dispute, accountability may begin with disclosure of records, an explanation of a transaction, correction of an inaccurate account, repayment of money where legally owed, or an acknowledgment of a specific decision.

In an institutional matter, accountability may involve review, correction, an explanation, or a formal finding.

In a criminal matter, responsibility must be determined through the appropriate legal process.

The existence of a complaint does not establish that a crime occurred.

The existence of an allegation does not establish guilt.

Nor can this document predict that any family member will face prosecution or imprisonment.

What I can ask for is a process capable of establishing the facts.

If the records support my concerns, the relevant evidence should be examined by the appropriate person or authority.

If the records contradict my interpretation, that should be acknowledged.

If important records are missing, their absence should be recorded rather than filled with speculation.

The objective is a reliable account of what happened and what, if anything, can still be done.

34. THE SEVENTH QUESTION: HOW DO I RECOVER MY VOICE WITHOUT LOSING SIGHT OF THE EVIDENCE?

The final theme of the supplied transcript concerns reclaiming one’s voice.

For me, the practical meaning of that idea is the ability to describe my experiences without having to pretend that they were insignificant.

I can explain that I experienced bereavement, financial insecurity, relationship difficulties, professional humiliation, serious injury, and frustration in seeking assistance.

I can identify the people and institutions connected with the events I describe.

I can preserve the documents I possess.

I can ask questions about decisions that affected my life.

I can distinguish between what I remember, what a document establishes, and what I still need to find out.

None of these activities requires me to establish another person's guilt before the evidence has been examined.

Nor do I need to abandon my account simply because some questions remain unanswered.

The right approach is to preserve the testimony, examine the evidence, and remain willing to distinguish between a conclusion that is supported and one that is not.

PART XI — THE SPIRITUAL DIMENSION OF MY TESTIMONY

35. THE DIFFERENCE BETWEEN SPIRITUAL MEANING AND PROOF

My writing includes religious and prophetic language.

I have described my experiences through themes of witnessing, exile, survival, truth, accountability, and faith.

These themes help express the meaning I attach to events in my life.

They do not replace the need for documentary evidence when a claim concerns another person's conduct.

A spiritual interpretation may explain why I understand an experience as a test of endurance or a call to preserve the truth.

It cannot independently establish that a relative concealed an inheritance, that a former partner committed a particular offence, or that an institution deliberately coordinated against me.

Those questions require evidence appropriate to the claim.

For me, faith and evidentiary discipline are not necessarily incompatible.

I can believe that truth matters while acknowledging that I do not yet know every fact.

I can believe in accountability without declaring that a particular person has already been found responsible.

I can describe an experience as spiritually significant without treating that significance as proof of another person's motives.

That distinction strengthens rather than diminishes the credibility of my testimony.

36. THE WITNESS AND THE QUESTION OF SILENCE

In my writing, the idea of the witness represents the persistence of a personal account despite the author’s experience of being unheard.

I understand the archive as a way of preserving what I remember, what I have written, and the documentary materials I believe are relevant.

The witness is not infallible simply because the witness has suffered.

The witness is entitled to be heard, but the testimony must still be examined.

A document may support one part of an account while contradicting another.

A memory may be sincere but incomplete.

A conclusion may appear persuasive while requiring further evidence.

Recognising those possibilities does not erase the underlying experience.

It establishes the conditions under which other people can assess it fairly.

That is the standard I want applied to my family testimony.

PART XII — THE EVIDENCE THAT MUST BE OBTAINED BEFORE CONCLUSIONS CAN BE DRAWN

37. THE INHERITANCE RECORD

The first priority is to establish the facts surrounding my grandmother’s death and any estate.

The necessary records include the will, probate or administration documents, executor details, estate accounts, distribution records, and any correspondence concerning an entitlement I may have had.

My own bank records should be compared with the estate records to establish what I received and when.

Any communications explaining the distribution should be preserved in their original form.

The reported six-week European trip should be treated as a separate factual question unless evidence establishes a connection between the trip and the estate.

The outcome should be a clear account of what property existed, who administered it, what distributions occurred, and whether I had a legal entitlement that was not satisfied.

38. THE BANKRUPTCY AND RELATIONSHIP RECORD

The next priority is the original bankruptcy paperwork.

The relevant documents include the completed forms, any schedules of liabilities, correspondence with the trustee or adviser, and any records relating to the financial arrangements involving Steve Iasonidis.

The recollection concerning Jodie Bongetti's advice should be recorded separately and dated as accurately as possible.

If there are contemporaneous messages, they should be preserved with their original dates and context.

If there are no written records, the conversation should remain identified as a personal recollection.

The resulting analysis should establish what information was required, what was disclosed, what advice was given, and what financial consequences can be demonstrated.

39. THE COMPENSATION AND COMPLAINT RECORD

For every application for assistance or compensation, the following information should be collected:

• The organisation responsible.

• The application or complaint reference.

• The date submitted.

• The assistance sought.

• The documents supplied.

• The decision and its date.

• The reasons provided.

• The relevant policy, law, or eligibility requirements.

• Any review or appeal.

• The current status.

This should cover the legal aid, employment, insurance, income-assistance, victims-of-crime compensation, AFCA, and superannuation-related matters I have described.

Each claim should be assessed separately.

The objective is to identify what was decided, whether the reasons were accurate, and whether any further remedy remains available.

40. THE FAMILY COMMUNICATION RECORD

The family-related investigation should identify communications involving the people named in this document.

Relevant materials may include emails, text messages, letters, financial documents, and records of conversations made contemporaneously.

Each communication should be assessed in context.

A statement made before an event cannot necessarily establish what a person knew afterward.

A message discussing a financial matter does not automatically establish that its author understood every legal consequence.

A person's failure to respond does not necessarily establish agreement, concealment, or intent.

The precise content and surrounding circumstances matter.

The resulting chronology should establish who said what, when it was communicated, and how it relates to the events under examination.

41. THE MEDICAL AND SUPPORT RECORD

My account of serious injury and brain damage should be supported, where available, by relevant medical documentation.

The necessary records may include hospital records, discharge summaries, diagnostic assessments, rehabilitation records, and professional assessments of any ongoing support needs.

Only the information necessary to establish the relevant issue should be disclosed publicly.

Medical evidence may establish the nature and effects of an injury.

It does not, without additional evidence, establish that another person caused the injury or intended a particular outcome.

The purpose is to document the effects on my life and determine what support was required.

42. THE PUBLICATION AND EMPLOYMENT RECORD

The events involving Recovered, Not Cured: A Journey Through Schizophrenia and the professional difficulties I have described should be supported by the relevant publication and employment records.

The necessary material may include published articles, original statements, publisher correspondence, contracts, employment records, termination documents, and compensation decisions.

Where I allege that a statement was false or defamatory, the exact statement must be identified.

Where I allege a financial loss, the loss must be calculated and connected to the conduct said to have caused it.

The resulting analysis should distinguish between my experience of humiliation, evidence of specific conduct, and any formal finding of legal responsibility.

PART XIII — A PRELIMINARY ASSESSMENT OF THE UNRESOLVED QUESTIONS

43. WHAT IS ESTABLISHED BY THIS DOCUMENT?

This document establishes that I have provided a personal account of serious difficulties involving family relationships, bereavement, financial insecurity, a former engagement, professional experiences, injury, and attempts to obtain assistance.

It also establishes that I have identified specific people and public repositories as relevant to the account I wish to investigate.

It records my recollection that I was left with approximately $1,000 after my grandmother’s death while family members went to Europe for six weeks.

It records my recollection that Jodie Bongetti encouraged me not to include Steve Iasonidis’s name on my bankruptcy paperwork.

It records my allegations concerning financial abuse, professional humiliation, and the consequences of my injury.

These are statements of my account.

They should not be confused with independent findings that the events occurred exactly as described or that a named person was legally responsible for them.

44. WHAT REMAINS UNVERIFIED?

The following matters remain unverified within this document:

Whether I had a legal entitlement to an inheritance and, if so, whether it was withheld.

Whether any relative deliberately concealed information concerning an estate or financial arrangement.

Whether the advice I recall receiving about my bankruptcy paperwork was given in the precise terms I remember.

Whether Steve Iasonidis engaged in conduct meeting the legal definition of financial abuse or another actionable wrong.

Whether particular institutions made errors in deciding my applications for assistance or compensation.

Whether the professional events I describe involved legally actionable defamation or other misconduct.

The precise nature and documented effects of my injury.

The specific conduct, if any, connecting my relatives to the alleged failures of protection I describe.

The allegation concerning an assassination attempt involving Bill Shorten and the question of what any relative knew about it.

These questions require evidence beyond the existence of my account or the public availability of my archive.

45. WHAT WOULD SUPPORT A FINDING OF WRONGDOING?

A finding of wrongdoing would require evidence relevant to the particular allegation.

For an inheritance dispute, that may include a will, probate records, estate accounts, and proof of an entitlement.

For an allegation of financial abuse, that may include transaction records, agreements, communications, and evidence of the relevant conduct.

For an allegation of misleading advice, that may include the original paperwork, contemporaneous communications, and evidence of what the adviser knew.

For an employment or compensation dispute, that may include formal decisions, applicable legal requirements, and records demonstrating the relevant error or loss.

For an allegation of coordinated conduct, evidence would be needed to establish the connection between the individuals involved rather than merely showing that they were part of the same family or that events occurred in the same period.

For a serious criminal allegation, reliable evidence of the relevant conduct would be essential.

The appropriate conclusion may differ from one issue to another.

Some concerns may be substantiated.

Others may be partly supported.

Some may remain unresolved because the relevant records are unavailable.

Others may be contradicted by the evidence.

A credible account must be prepared to acknowledge all four possibilities.

CONCLUSION — I AM ASKING FOR THE TRUTH ABOUT MY LIFE

I was born into a family whose relationships form part of my identity and personal history.

I have described my grandmother's death as a profound loss. I have described the financial circumstances that followed as leaving me without the security I believed I needed. I have described a former engagement that I experienced as financially damaging, professional experiences that I found humiliating, a serious injury that I believe changed my life, and repeated difficulties obtaining assistance.

I have named Doug and April McLean, Jodie and Dave Bongetti, Brad and Ciara McLean, and Bruce McMaster because I want my family-related questions organised around identifiable people and events.

I have named Steve Iasonidis because my former engagement is part of the financial history I want examined.

I have identified my grandmother because her death, and my understanding of what followed, occupy a central place in my account.

But naming people is only the beginning.

The real work is to establish what happened.

If there was an inheritance, the estate records should show what it contained and how it was administered.

If money was transferred, the financial records should show the transactions.

If advice was given, the original documents and communications should help establish what was said.

If an institution refused assistance, its decision should explain why.

If I was injured, the medical records should help establish the nature and effects of the injury.

If a publication damaged my reputation, the original publication should be examined.

If someone made a decision that affected my rights, the relevant decision and the applicable requirements should be identified.

And if an allegation cannot be substantiated, that limitation should be stated honestly.

I do not need to claim that every person acted with the same motive to explain that I experienced a series of deeply painful events.

I do not need to predict imprisonment to ask whether an action was lawful.

I do not need to establish a conspiracy to investigate a financial transaction.

I do not need to abandon my faith to acknowledge uncertainty.

Nor do I need to surrender my testimony simply because some of its most important questions remain unanswered.

My archive represents an attempt to preserve the documents and writings through which I have tried to understand my life. Its value will depend on how carefully the underlying material is examined, how accurately its contents are described, and how fairly competing explanations are considered.

I want the history of my family relationships recorded without exaggeration and without erasure.

I want the inheritance question answered through the estate records.

I want the bankruptcy question answered through the original paperwork.

I want the compensation and financial complaints examined through their actual decisions.

I want my experience of injury and professional difficulty understood in its proper context.

And I want the distinction between what I know, what I remember, what I believe, and what I still need to establish to remain visible throughout the record.

The purpose of this document is not to pronounce a verdict on my relatives.

It is to establish the questions that matter, preserve the account I have given, and identify the evidence needed to reach reliable conclusions.

My life cannot be reduced to an allegation, a financial figure, a family disagreement, or a collection of unresolved applications.

It is a life that I have tried to document through writing, research, and personal testimony.

I want that testimony examined seriously.

I want the evidence preserved.

And I want the truth, whatever the records ultimately establish, to take precedence over assumption.

That is the purpose of this document.

That is the standard I ask to be applied to my story.

And that is the record I want to leave behind.

Important limitation: The contents of every file in these repositories have not been individually retrieved, authenticated, and cross-referenced in preparing this narrative. Consequently, this document does not attribute specific documentary findings to files that have not been examined.

For any public release, the next evidentiary step should be to produce a document-by-document register containing direct source links, dates, authors, relevant passages, corroboration, and limitations. That register would allow the family-related allegations to be assessed against the underlying material rather than relying on the narrative alone.
