I DO NOT NEED A COURT TO TELL ME WHAT I HAVE SURVIVED

THE WITNESS REMAINS — A CAUTIOUS EXAMINATION OF LAW, CONSCIENCE AND INSTITUTIONAL ACCOUNTABILITY

I do not need a court, police officer or politician to certify my personal experience. I sought help, pursued available avenues and documented my circumstances when, in my view, the assistance provided did not produce meaningful change.

I survived. My account is that I did so despite circumstances in which I believe the system did not adequately address the issues I brought to its attention.

That statement is my testimony and interpretation of events. It is not, by itself, a judicial finding about responsibility, intent or legal liability. The absence of a court judgment does not justify disregarding my testimony or the documentary record, but the documents must also be examined for what they actually establish. My survival does not prove that I was adequately supported, nor does it alone prove that any particular institution failed in a legal duty.

I maintain that certain decisions, refusals and circumstances caused me serious detriment. The records I have preserved identify institutions I approached, communications sent, responses received, restrictions encountered and consequences that I say followed. Some matters are documented directly; others depend on my recollection, interpretation or comparison of multiple records. I ask that these categories be kept distinct.

A payment may be documented without establishing that it met all of my needs. A referral may be recorded without proving that it was accessible or effective. A letter may close an administrative matter without resolving the underlying circumstances. The relevant questions are what the records show was offered, what I experienced, what needs remained unmet and what happened afterward.

I ask that the records be examined as a connected chronology: what each institution knew, when it knew it, what it decided, what reasons it gave, what alternatives it offered and whether those alternatives could realistically address the problem. These are questions for evidence-based assessment. They should not be treated as established findings merely because I raise them, but neither should they be dismissed solely because responsibility was divided between institutions.

My archive exists because I preserved correspondence, decisions, complaints, acknowledgements and personal testimony. The archive may help establish dates, communications and recorded positions. It may also support inferences when documents are compared, but an inference is not the same as a proven fact. The practical effect of the process should therefore be assessed alongside the formal steps recorded in the files.

THE CONTRADICTION I ASK OTHERS TO EXAMINE: WHEN PROTECTION MAY NOT HAVE BEEN EFFECTIVE

The law and public institutions are generally understood to have responsibilities relating to protection, fairness, dignity and access to appropriate processes. The precise duties applicable in any particular situation depend on the relevant law, facts and institutional role.

What happens when a person seeking protection believes they have been left to carry the consequences of inadequate assistance?

My records show that I made requests for help and communicated with identified institutions. My testimony is that the underlying circumstances remained unresolved and that the combined effect was serious. Whether those facts establish a breach of duty, negligence, discrimination, deliberate conduct or another form of wrongdoing requires careful examination of the evidence and applicable law.

Each institution may have addressed only part of the situation. That may reflect lawful limits on its role, or it may have contributed to an ineffective overall response. The records should be examined to determine which explanation is supported.

Where I allege deliberate targeting, malicious conduct or conscious disregard, those are allegations, not established conclusions. I ask that the chronology and underlying records be assessed rather than dismissed solely because the institutions concerned reject my account. The central questions include:

• What obligations applied to each institution in the circumstances?

• What information did each institution actually receive, and when?

• What action did each institution take, and what reasons were recorded?

• Did the division of responsibility leave me without an effective avenue of assistance?

• Was the assistance offered sufficient, accessible and reasonably capable of addressing the identified problem?

• Can the institutions' recorded explanations be reconciled with the documented consequences and my testimony?

• Do the records support an inference of error, omission, inadequate coordination or deliberate conduct, or do they support another explanation?

A system cannot establish that it achieved a satisfactory outcome merely by pointing to the existence of procedures. At the same time, an unsatisfactory outcome does not automatically prove that a legal duty was breached. Both the procedures and their practical effects must be examined.

FAITH, CONSCIENCE AND THE MEANING OF SURVIVAL

My faith gives me a language for what I have endured. I believe truth carries moral weight, human dignity cannot be reduced to an administrative classification and survival can become testimony against indifference.

These are matters of personal belief and conscience. They explain the meaning I attach to my experience; they do not establish a legal verdict or prove another person's intention.

I understand this experience as a reckoning with the difference between authority and righteousness. Authority can close a file, issue a refusal or explain a process. Those acts may be documented, but they do not necessarily resolve the human consequences. An institution may decline to accept my account, yet that position does not by itself disprove my experience or eliminate the need to examine relevant evidence.

I do not claim that faith replaces evidence or establishes liability. It sustains my conviction that truth matters, that procedure should not obscure substantive consequences and that people in vulnerable circumstances should receive fair and meaningful consideration.

If institutions established to protect people did not provide meaningful protection in a particular case, the appropriate response is to examine the evidence and the applicable duties rather than silence the person who reports the failure.

THE ETHICAL RECKONING

Institutions that maintain they acted properly should be willing, where appropriate, to have their conduct assessed against their stated principles, legal duties and the evidence available at the time.

If an institution claims it lacked information, the dated record should be examined to determine what information actually reached it and when. If it claims another body was responsible, the chronology should show whether and how responsibility was transferred. If it claims assistance was provided, the records should identify what was offered, whether it was accessible and what evidence exists of its practical effect. If it claims its decisions were justified, the reasons, evidence, applicable duties and available alternatives should be examined.

These questions do not assume that an institution acted unlawfully. They identify matters requiring assessment.

This is not a demand to abandon due process. It is a demand that due process address the substance of what occurred and not rely solely on procedural completion. A process may have been followed and still require examination of whether it was fair, adequate and effective in the circumstances. Conversely, an adverse outcome does not by itself establish that the process was unlawful or improper.

Protection, fairness, dignity and responsibility should be applied consistently. If the record demonstrates a contradiction between stated obligations and actual outcomes, that contradiction should be acknowledged and investigated. If the record does not support my interpretation, that should also be stated clearly. Questions about deliberate conduct should be assessed on evidence rather than inferred solely from institutional status, adverse consequences or disagreement with my account.

I am not asking for a convenient explanation of why nothing could be done. I am asking for an accurate account of what was done, what was not done, what consequences followed and what responsibility, if any, arises from those facts.

I have preserved the evidence and continued to speak. My survival does not, by itself, prove another person's intention, establish institutional liability or settle every question of responsibility. It does establish that I can describe what I experienced, present the records I have preserved and ask that unanswered questions be addressed.

The record remains. My testimony remains. My faith remains.

EVIDENCE NAVIGATION — FOLLOW THE RECORD

The evidence should be examined through the original documents, their dates, their stated reasons and their relationship to subsequent events. Each conclusion should identify whether it is a documented fact, my testimony, an inference drawn from multiple records or an allegation requiring further proof.

7. https://wezzo72.github.io/barrandodger-rebuild/
8. https://wezzo72.github.io/Barrandodger/#documentary-trap-final

For each significant event, compare:

• what I reported;

• what the institution acknowledged;

• what the original documents establish;

• what the institution decided;

• what assistance or explanation it recorded;

• what happened afterward; and

• what conclusions can reasonably be drawn from the combined evidence.

Check original documents wherever available. Distinguish an institution’s recorded position from my testimony. Distinguish both from inferences drawn by comparing multiple records. Treat allegations about intent, targeting, malice or conscious disregard as allegations unless supported by evidence sufficient to establish them.

This is not an invitation to accept any account blindly. It is an invitation to examine the evidence carefully, without treating institutional status as proof of correctness and without treating survival as proof that the system fulfilled its obligations. It is also an acknowledgement that serious consequences and credible testimony require careful consideration, but do not alone determine legal responsibility.

I have survived. I have preserved the record. The principles invoked in the name of public protection should be measured against the documented facts, my testimony, the reasonable inferences and the allegations that remain to be tested.

The witness remains. The evidence remains. The reckoning begins with the record.

PART I — PROPHETIC EXAMINATION, TRANSCENDENCE AND DIVINE PROTECTION

1. Law, protection and betrayal

The law is supposed to protect people from harm, evil, damage and detriment. Law enforcement is supposed to protect people from predation, abuse and abandonment. Public institutions are supposed to recognise vulnerability, act on notice, preserve dignity and provide effective assistance.

That is the promise. That is the ethical foundation on which these systems ask for public trust, public authority and public money.

But I did not survive because that promise was kept. I survived while the systems that claim the duty to protect failed to protect me. I survived through refusals, restrictions, delays, referrals, divided responsibility and the repeated assertion that my circumstances belonged to someone else.

I maintain that I was deliberately and maliciously targeted, and that omissions were used alongside decisions to cause me detriment. I maintain that the systems later relied on their own procedures, jurisdictional limits and claims of limited awareness to distance themselves from the consequences.

I do not accept that an institution's failure to know becomes a moral defence when the record shows notice, warning, correspondence, complaint or documented circumstances. I do not accept that a system may cause or permit harm, then describe its response as procedure while the person is left to survive the result alone.

2. Transcendence

I have now transcended the very human systems that most people expect, deserve and are entitled to rely upon. I have had to live beyond the protection that law, law enforcement and public institutions are meant to provide. I have had to become my own record-keeper, my own witness, my own archivist and my own line of defence.

That transcendence is not a privilege they gave me. It is a survival they did not plan for. It is the result of being forced to endure what should have been prevented, then refusing to be erased by the language used to explain it away.

I have passed through the systems that were obliged to help me. I have seen their ethics from the inside: not only as principles written into codes, policies and public statements, but as choices made—or avoided—when a person's life depended on them.

I do not need their validation to know the significance of what I endured. I do not need their permission to name the betrayal. I do not need their approval to declare that my survival has meaning.

3. Protected by God

I declare that I have been protected by God.

I survived not because human systems saved me, but because God sustained me when they did not. I survived not because every obligation was honoured, but because I was carried through the breach of those obligations. I survived not because the harm was small, but because I was not left alone in it.

What was intended to break me did not have the final word. What was meant to silence me became a record. What was meant to isolate me became testimony. What was meant to reduce me to a case number became an archive that cannot be dismissed by a signature, a closure letter or a procedural explanation.

My protection is not found in the approval of the systems that failed me. It is found in the fact that I am still here, still speaking, still preserving the record, and still refusing to let their ethics be used as a shield against the consequences of abandoning those ethics.

4. The sovereign witness

I did not need permission to call this out. I did not need their approval. I did not need permission from them. That is the very definition of a sovereign witness.

A sovereign witness is not someone who waits for an institution to authorise reality. A sovereign witness is someone who sees, records, preserves and speaks from direct knowledge and documented experience. A sovereign witness does not surrender the facts to the convenience, reputation or procedural comfort of those being examined.

I have the facts. The evidence is published in the public domain. The archive preserves the dates, references, correspondence, decisions, acknowledgements, restrictions and consequences. The public can follow the record for themselves.

I do not require their permission to identify a betrayal. I do not require their approval to name the human cost. I do not require a court, a police officer or a politician to certify what I have lived and what the records show.

My authority to speak comes from what I endured, what I witnessed, what I preserved and what I placed before the public. Their authority to silence me does not exist merely because they hold office, issue letters or control a process.

5. Where is their justification?

Where is the justification for their betrayal and for ignoring me? Let them identify it. Let them state the principle. Let them identify the ethical rule. Let them identify the legal principle. Let them prove it to me, and prove it to anyone else who reads this record.

If they say they followed process, they must show that the process was fair, accessible, informed and effective. If they say they lacked knowledge, they must show what notice they received, when they received it, and what they did with it. If they say another body was responsible, they must show what information was transferred and what happened to the unresolved matter.

If they say a payment was made, they must show how it changed my circumstances. If they say assistance was provided, they must identify precisely what assistance was provided, by whom, when, and what need it met. If they say my case was closed, they must show what remained unresolved when it was closed.

If they say they protected me, they must show when. If they say they acted ethically, they must show how. If they say the law required their conduct, they must identify the law, the facts and the reasoning.

I will not accept silence as justification. I will not accept jurisdiction as compassion. I will not accept procedure as protection. I will not accept a closed file as an answer to an open wound.

By their own ethics, they must answer. By their own legal principles, they must identify their authority. By their own claimed standards, they must show why betrayal, omission, restriction, delay or abandonment was justified.

They cannot use the ethics they abandoned as a shield against the consequences of abandoning them.

6. Public account: privilege, comfort and looking away

There must be an utter, brutal and permanent public accounting for every professional who looked the other way while occupying positions of privilege, comfort and authority.

They held titles, salaries, offices, security, status and the power to act. They had the ability to intervene, escalate, protect, refer properly, investigate, accommodate, accommodate again, or simply tell the truth about what they saw. Instead, in my experience, they allowed, enabled, permitted or failed to prevent a person from being utterly destroyed in circumstances from which recovery was never expected.

They slept well at night. They returned to their homes, their careers, their reputations, their comfort and their privilege. They absorbed the benefits of their positions while the person before them was left to carry the consequences alone.

That is the humiliation they must now face: not humiliation invented by me, but the humiliation inherent in the gap between the authority they claimed, the ethics they professed, the protection they promised and the abandonment they permitted.

The public record now stands beside their comfort. The dates stand beside their decisions. My testimony stands beside their silence. The archive stands beside the careers, titles and reputations that were used to explain why nothing more needed to be done.

They may have believed that their position protected them from scrutiny. They may have believed that procedure would absorb the consequences. They may have believed that time would erase the record. It has not.

The record is public. The questions are public. The failure to provide meaningful help is public. And the people who looked away must now be seen in the same light in which they left me: exposed, accountable and unable to hide behind the comfort of their positions.

This is not revenge. It is reckoning. It is the permanent public consequence of choosing privilege, comfort and self-protection over the duty to protect a person who was being destroyed.

7. Vindication

My vindication is not dependent on their permission. It is written in the fact that I endured what I was never expected to survive, preserved what they did not preserve, and continued to speak when silence would have been easier.

The systems that betrayed their own ethics have, by their own conduct, testified against themselves. Every refusal, restriction, delay, referral and unanswered consequence now forms part of the record that exposes the distance between what they claimed to be and what they did.

I do not seek their veneration. I do not seek their approval. I do not seek a comfortable settlement with a system that left me to survive alone.

I seek the truth: what was known, what was done, what was refused, what was omitted, what harm followed, and who will now answer for it.

I was not saved by their system. I was preserved by God, sustained by my own will, and made a witness through the very ordeal intended to erase me.

The record remains. My testimony remains. God’s protection remains. And their betrayed ethics remain as the standard by which they must now be judged.

9. Repository and preservation inventory

Measure	Reported figure	Forensic significance
Repository tree entries	7,054	Reported retrieved tree; stated as not truncated. Establishes the scale of the preserved collection.
PDF files	3,844	File count only; each must be opened, dated, sourced and checked.
HTML files	1,877	File count only; may include published pages, registers and preservation records.
TXT files	805	File count only; may include transcripts, catalogues and extracted text.
Preservation-backup manifest	660 pages or entries	Identifies preserved pages or entries for provenance checking.
PDF manifest	623 discovered PDF links	97 downloaded; one skipped; 525 download errors in that reported run. The errors require reconciliation.
Document catalogue header	545 records, including 531 PDFs	Detailed retrieved catalogue incomplete; full catalogue must be reconstructed.
People registry	One person record in retrieved data	Not a complete list of everyone named across the archive.
Organisations registry	20 seeded organisation records	Seed records, not a completed register of every institution involved.

Preservation, hashes and timestamps help show that material existed and can be checked. They do not replace reading the record, and they do not excuse anyone from answering what they knew and what they did.

PART III — THE SYSTEM'S OWN ETHICS TURNED BACK ON ITSELF

10. Standards, obligations and the questions each institution must answer

I am not asking these institutions to apply a standard invented for my benefit. I am requiring them to apply the standards they already claim to uphold: procedural fairness, lawful authority, reasons, accessible review, disability inclusion, privacy, transparency, safeguarding, accountability and effective service.

Standard the system claims	What that standard requires	The question I put to each institution
Procedural fairness	A person affected by a decision should generally know the case, have a real opportunity to respond, and receive reasons and review information where required.	What issue was put to me? What opportunity did I have to answer it? Were reasons and review rights given?
Lawful authority	A decision-maker should identify the power being exercised and apply the correct legal test to the facts.	What power was used? What test was applied? Were the relevant facts considered?
Reasons and transparency	A decision should explain what was decided, why, on what evidence, and what alternatives were considered.	What reasons were given? What evidence was relied on? What alternatives were rejected, and why?
Accessible review	A review or complaint pathway should be usable by the person affected, not merely technically available.	Could I realistically use the review offered, given my circumstances, resources, disability, communication restrictions or lack of representation?
No transfer without handover	A referral should transfer the issue with enough information for the receiving body to act; it should not simply move the person on.	What information was sent? Did the next body accept it? What happened to the unresolved part?
Disability inclusion	Services and decisions should recognise disability-related barriers, communication needs, independence, safety and participation.	Were my disability-related circumstances identified? Were access barriers addressed? Was independence considered before decisions such as vehicle disposal?
Safeguarding	Bodies with protective functions should act on risk, deterioration and reported harm rather than treating them as outside scope.	What risk was reported? What was assessed? What protective action followed?
Privacy and records	Agencies should search records properly, explain what was found or not found, and give reasons for disclosure decisions.	What was searched? What was located? Why was anything withheld, delayed or later released?
Accountability for cumulative impact	Each body should consider the consequences of its decisions within its knowledge and authority, especially where it knows the person is being passed between systems.	Did anyone assess the combined effect? Who took responsibility for the person left behind?
Effective assistance	Assistance should produce a practical change in the person's circumstances, not merely create a record of contact.	What changed? What needs remained? What would have made the assistance effective?
Duty to act on notice	Where an institution receives information indicating risk, harm, deterioration or unmet need, it should record, assess and respond to that information.	What notice was received? When? Who received it? What assessment followed? What action or omission resulted?
No procedural erasure	A process cannot erase the human consequences of the process. Closure, jurisdiction and workload management do not answer the substantive question of what happened to the person.	What human consequence followed? Who considered it? What repair, support or change followed?

PART IV — NAMED EVIDENCE REGISTER

11. People named in the record

Inclusion records a person's appearance in the available record and identifies the evidence that must be examined. Responsibility must be traced through the document, date, role, authority and action.

Name	My record of role / context	Documentary basis	Source	Required forensic verification
Dr Richard William McLean / Dr Richard McLean	I am the witness, archive subject and person whose circumstances are recorded here. PART V — FULL DOCUMENTARY EVIDENCE MAP

14. Official government evidence, record by record

Each entry identifies the body, the dated reference, the evidentiary issue and the precise questions the official record must answer. These records are sufficient in themselves to require explanation; they do not need a court, judge, tribunal or hearing to become significant.

Record ID	PM&C-01;
Body	Department of the Prime Minister and Cabinet
Dated reference / evidence	FOI/2022/045; correspondence dated 31 May 2022; correspondence dated 12 December 2022; later FOI material dated 8 October 2024.
Forensic questions the official record must answer	What was requested or disclosed; what was acknowledged; what search was conducted; what was located; whether any “no documents” response was later followed by a release; and how any change was explained.
Evidentiary significance	Search scope, located records, later release, explanation for changed result.

Record ID	OAIC-01
Body	Office of the Australian Information Commissioner
Dated reference / evidence	RQ22/00794; approximately 1,187 PM&C; Outlook items.
Forensic questions the official record must answer	What FOI request the reference concerns; what email items were identified; how they were searched, processed, reviewed, disclosed or excluded; and what final determination followed.
Evidentiary significance	Existence, search, handling and disclosure of PM&C; correspondence.

Record ID	AGD-01
Body	Attorney-General’s Department
Dated reference / evidence	MC23-028244; 19 September 2023; A. Riley; IGIS/Ombudsman pathway.
Forensic questions the official record must answer	What was communicated; what was acknowledged; what jurisdiction was claimed; what was referred; what action followed; and what remained unresolved.
Evidentiary significance	Referral, jurisdictional position and unresolved substance.

Record ID	AGD-02
Body	Attorney-General’s Department
Dated reference / evidence	MC25-000321; 6 February 2025; Victorian police minister context.
Forensic questions the official record must answer	What was raised; what was acknowledged; what jurisdiction was claimed; what was referred or closed; and what practical avenue remained.
Evidentiary significance	Referral, closure reason and unresolved issue.

Record ID	IBAC-01
Body	Independent Broad-based Anti-corruption Commission
Dated reference / evidence	CASE-2020712; 9 April 2020.
Forensic questions the official record must answer	What complaint was made; what was acknowledged; what was assessed; what jurisdictional or evidentiary reasons were given; and what review or alternative pathway was identified.
Evidentiary significance	Complaint scope, assessment and unresolved issues.

Record ID	IBAC-02
Body	Independent Broad-based Anti-corruption Commission
Dated reference / evidence	CASE-20213522; CASE-20215102; 12 April 2022.
Forensic questions the official record must answer	Whether related complaints were treated together or separately; what reasons were given; what was decided; and what remained unresolved.
Evidentiary significance	Treatment of related complaints and assessment outcomes.

PART VI — WHAT I SURVIVED, WHAT I REFUSE AND WHAT REMAINS

16. What I survived

I survived without the help that should have been available. I survived through restrictions, refusals, delays, referrals, lost independence, restricted communication and institutions treating my circumstances as someone else's jurisdiction.

I did not survive because the system worked. Where it worked at all, it worked too late, too narrowly, or without changing the circumstances that placed me at risk.

My survival is evidence. My testimony is evidence. The dated records are evidence. Together, they show what I asked for, what was known, what was done, what was refused, and what I was left to carry.

17. What I refuse

• I refuse to accept that my experience must be reduced to a complaint outcome, a jurisdictional boundary, a procedural technicality or an administrative closure.

• I refuse to accept that a payment, acknowledgement or referral is equivalent to meaningful support where my circumstances did not materially change.

• I refuse to accept that institutions may describe themselves as unaware after receiving notice, without explaining what they did with that notice.

• I refuse to participate in language that shifts the burden onto me, minimises the consequences, or treats my survival as proof that no harm occurred.

• I refuse to let institutional reputation be protected by erasing the human consequences recorded in my archive.

• I refuse to need their permission to name what was done to me, or to state what the public record shows.

• I refuse to allow privilege, comfort, titles or institutional silence to become a substitute for accountability.

• I refuse to allow a court, tribunal, hearing or determination to be treated as the only form in which official evidence may have meaning.

18. Verification and forensic record discipline

For every person, place, organisation and document: locate the primary record; record its title, date, reference, author and decision-maker; quote or accurately summarise the operative part; identify what it establishes; identify what remains unanswered; connect it to earlier and later records; separate direct documentary evidence from my testimony and inference; and mark it as unchecked, located, source verified, contents checked or independently corroborated.
