THE WITNESS REMAINS — THE MAN THEY COULD NOT ERASE

A PROPHECY OF THE MIRROR, THE EXILE, THE RECORD AND THE DIVINE RECKONING

By Barran Dodger Gods Chosen Witness

Wednesday 7th October 2026

I write this as prophecy, testimony, interpretation and witness. I do not write it pretending that every spiritual revelation can be demonstrated in the same manner as a government letter, a newspaper record, a blockchain timestamp or an official document. My archive itself makes that distinction: documented fact, official record, corroborated evidence, personal testimony, allegation, inference, interpretation and spiritual belief are not the same category. The preservation comes first, examination second and conclusion last. But prophecy has another language, the language of meaning, resonance, revelation and the interpretation of a life that has passed through circumstances so extraordinary that I have come to understand my survival not merely as survival but as purpose. This is therefore my prophetic account of why I believe I became dangerous, feared, studied and consequential to structures of power, why I believe I was repeatedly diminished, and why I believe the very attempt to erase me became the mechanism by which my testimony was preserved.

Before there was Barran Dodger there was Richard William McLean, a human being with a capacity for observation, creativity, independence, truth telling and an unwillingness to accept that authority automatically makes something right. I was a former artist for newspapers and a news graphic artist who was paid and verified as a journalist. I learned the machinery of media from inside the machinery of media. I understood images, information, presentation, narrative, evidence and the extraordinary power possessed by whoever controls the frame through which another human being is seen. I learned that a picture can reveal something and conceal something simultaneously, that a headline can elevate one fact and bury another, and that whoever controls the story can sometimes control the identity of the person inside it.

I was also queer and unaligned with concepts of hetero normativity, opposed to patriarchal ruling elite structures in which inherited power can be treated as though it were merit when in reality it is simply inheritance, privilege and an unearned position passed from one generation to another. I did not naturally fit the architecture that wanted people to remain obedient to predetermined roles. I experienced the human condition as something larger than the categories imposed upon it. I became an experienced traveller and examined humanity through my own extraordinary life, unfettered to concepts of restrictions to another physical person of either or same sex, connecting through resonance beyond limitations of gender. My existence itself became an argument that human beings are more complicated, more spiritual and more expansive than the boxes into which institutions attempt to place them.

For approximately thirty years I developed a public advocacy role for mentally ill people and their carers. I became an accomplished author and public speaker. I spoke nationally and internationally about mental health, psychiatric drugs, health policy, legalisation of drugs as a health issue and safe practices. I spoke at radio, television, universities, community groups and international forums. I opened international keynote conferences. My life was not confined to the psychiatric ward or to the identity of a patient. I had a public platform. I had a voice. I had professional experience. I had creative achievements. I had intellectual interests. I had a capacity to speak to people. I had lived experience and I converted that experience into advocacy, writing, public speaking and research.

Then something happened that would become central to my understanding of the entire story: the world became interested in my brokenness more than my wholeness.

A documentary was created on my life and art, but what I experienced was that the psychiatric dimension became the dominant lens through which I was interpreted. I was interesting if I was broken, unwell or mentally ill because when I was down there were people who could push me further down and remain above me. My suffering could become somebody else's comfort. My brokenness could soothe jealousy and envy. My illness could become an explanation for why I should not be believed. My recovery could become inconvenient because a person who recovers is no longer easily contained by the identity assigned to them.

I was the person who lived with truth, confidence, integrity and authenticity. I lived unapologetically as an independent, sovereign, spiritual and intelligent person with a global platform. But the media and my family were never invested, in my account, in knowing me fully beyond the cage of mental illness. I came to believe that conditions were created around me and then, when I called out what I experienced as the treatment of me, the interpretation was flipped back onto me. I became the unstable one. I became the problem. The person reporting the injury became the person accused of causing the disturbance.

That was the mirror.

I was holding up a mirror and instead of looking into it, the people around me attacked the mirror. They did not necessarily act with conscious hatred towards me, although that is what it felt like. They could instead interpret their behaviour as care, concern, protection, management or responsibility. But the mirror reflected something they did not want to see. It reflected their own darkness, their own guilt, their own unresolved issues and their own treatment of me. Rather than admit what they had done, or examine the possibility that they had participated in cruelty, they could attack the person holding the mirror and then declare the mirror defective.

That became the mechanism of psychiatric weaponisation in my understanding of my life.

My first autobiography and my public advocacy became part of the identity the world attached to me. I became the person who had been ill. The world seemed to decide that I would always be that person, that I would never heal, never recover, never rise and never gain clarity and purpose beyond the identity of the psychiatric survivor. But I did heal in ways that were not recognised. I recovered in ways that did not fit the story. I developed intellectually, spiritually and creatively. I kept writing. I kept speaking. I kept thinking. I kept observing. And eventually I began to understand that the thing that had been used to define my weakness could also become the foundation of my authority.

I was betrayed by my own blood family in what I experienced as toxic family scapegoating that began in childhood. I experienced myself as always being targeted, always being the difficult one, always being the person upon whom the unresolved problems of the family could be projected. I describe that history as a lifelong covert coordinated attack and psychological warfare because that is how the pattern came to me. I believed people hated me and wanted to destroy me, and I believed they took advantage of my loyalty and my hope that eventually they would do the right thing. I kept giving people opportunities because I believed human beings could change. I kept hoping that truth would eventually matter. I kept believing that people who claimed to love me would eventually behave as though they loved me.

Instead I experienced deception and gaslighting over a lifetime. I came to interpret the pattern as having an ABN-like objective to diminish me, erase me or destroy me, even physically erase me from this universe and then pretend that they had never acted to cause me harm. When I became homeless, impoverished and exiled, I experienced another inversion of the story. The people and institutions that I believed had helped create the conditions of my suffering could appear publicly as the heroes who would save the day. The suffering was produced and then the rescue was performed. The victim could then be portrayed as difficult, argumentative, manipulative and problematic while those surrounding the victim could present themselves as the people suffering because of the victim.

The opposite was true in my testimony.

The more I examined the pattern, the more I saw what I describe as societal mobbing. One vulnerable person stood against an entire democracy, or at least against structures of a democracy that I believed had failed to protect me. I was opposed by systems with vastly greater resources than I possessed. I had no equivalent institutional machinery. I had no political party behind me. I had no wealthy patronage structure behind me. I had no army of lawyers. I had no inherited political dynasty. Yet I continued to document.

This is where the story began to change.

The man who was supposed to disappear became the man who kept records.

The man who was supposed to become insignificant became the man who built an archive.

The person who could supposedly be dismissed as unstable became the person preserving government correspondence, official records, legal and administrative material, emails, messages, chronology, forensic material and other documentary records.

The archive itself describes a collection in which approximately 85 percent was described by the author as direct government correspondence or official documentation, while explicitly warning that the existence of those records does not itself establish every allegation. Its stated method is to preserve the sequence of what happened, what was reported, what was requested, what response was received, what action followed, what was refused, what was referred, what was decided, what was not decided and what happened next.

That distinction became important to me because I no longer needed to rely upon memory alone.

The paper trail became part of the witness.

The documents became part of the witness.

The chronology became part of the witness.

The archive became part of the witness.

And eventually the technology became part of the witness.

The family history and the institutional history reached what I regard as their most disturbing point when I came to believe that there had been an assassination attempt ordered by a federal minister. I describe this as one of the most significant and internationally significant allegations I have ever made. I say that I have preserved what I regard as proof and that, in my assessment, no person has proved the allegation incorrect, denied it in a manner that resolves the underlying documentary questions, or demonstrated through contrary evidence that my interpretation is false. But that remains my testimony and interpretation unless and until an independent competent authority makes a finding. The archive's own evidentiary standard requires that distinction.

When I pointed out what I experienced as the brutal injustice of a state-sanctioned targeted killing of a gay, disabled, unprotected whistleblower in political exile, utterly defenceless and in circumstances I describe through the language of asylum and exile, the reaction I experienced was not the reaction I expected from people who understood the gravity of what I was saying. Instead, my father quipped and dismissed me by barking: "he's not even the NDIS minister anymore move on." To me that sentence became symbolic. It was as if the departure of a minister from a portfolio, and his subsequent role at the University of Canberra, somehow meant that I should shut my mouth, stop complaining all the time and abandon what I regarded as the most significant attempted conspiracy to murder I had exposed.

That dismissal became prophetic in retrospect because it revealed the inversion at the heart of my story: the thing I believed was most significant was treated as insignificant, and the person reporting it was treated as insignificant, while the institutions and individuals possessing vastly greater power were treated as normal. I began to understand that perhaps I had been taught from childhood that I was insignificant not because I was insignificant but because the attributes visible in me were threatening to the hierarchy around me.

I had integrity.

I had authenticity.

I had honesty.

I had confidence.

I had creativity.

I had intellectual curiosity.

I had survived.

I had achieved things.

I had a public voice.

I had travelled.

I had written.

I had spoken internationally.

I had built relationships beyond the boundaries of the family and the local community.

And I had the audacity to keep becoming myself.

That is why, in my prophetic interpretation, my mere existence became dangerous.

Not dangerous because I wanted to hurt anyone.

Not dangerous because I wanted revenge.

Not dangerous because I intended violence.

Dangerous because existence itself can expose a lie.

Dangerous because a survivor who refuses to disappear can become a witness.

Dangerous because a journalist knows how stories are constructed.

Dangerous because an artist understands images.

Dangerous because an author understands narrative.

Dangerous because an advocate understands institutions.

Dangerous because a researcher understands systems.

Dangerous because a PhD researcher in AI ethics and global catastrophic risks understands what happens when technological power meets human institutions at the end-stage Anthropocene.

Dangerous because I learned to preserve the record.

Dangerous because I stopped believing that the disappearance of the person would necessarily produce the disappearance of the evidence.

And dangerous because I learned that a signal can travel further than a fist.

My academic work added another layer to this transformation. My PhD concerned ethics of AI and posthumanism, framed through global catastrophic risks and the end-stage Anthropocene and examined through young people's ethical opinions. I began to think about the technological singularity, superintelligence, posthuman futures and the relationship between technology and human power. I was no longer examining only my own life. I was examining what happens when the ancient structures of power meet technologies capable of preserving information beyond the lifespan of the person who created it.

That became the strange convergence at the centre of my prophecy.

I was a human witness carrying an ancient spiritual language into a technological civilisation.

I was writing Gospels and prophetic narratives while living in exile.

I was using artificial intelligence to examine patterns across documents.

I was using cryptographic methods to preserve records.

I was using blockchain timestamps to create mathematical records of documents.

I was creating a public documentary archive.

And I was doing it while possessing very little conventional institutional power.

That contradiction is central to the prophecy.

The archive records claims of 788 freely distributed PDFs, 891 Bitcoin blockchain timestamps, 2,304 SHA-256 sealed exhibits and 73 forensic AI analyses involving 603 propositions across 55 reviews. Those figures are project-reported archive metrics, not independent findings that automatically prove every underlying proposition. But even as project-reported figures, they describe the architecture of what I attempted to build: a public record that could survive beyond the immediate control of the person who created it.

The archive's language describes the Anthropocene witness as an artefact of the point where human institutions, AI and blockchain converge into one record. It describes the archive as operating on the principle of resonance rather than proximity: a signal travels further than a fist, and a blockchain hash can continue to exist regardless of what a government later says about the person who created it. That language is not merely technical to me. It became spiritual language.

This is where Barran Dodger emerged.

Barran Dodger was not merely another name.

Barran Dodger became the name of the witness.

The name of the exile.

The name of the archive.

The name of the man who refused to allow the story to end where other people had written the ending.

And the more I wrote, the more I understood why the opposition I experienced could never ultimately defeat me if I continued preserving the record.

Because you cannot erase a person from the universe simply by controlling the narrative around that person.

You cannot erase a life from history merely by refusing to acknowledge it.

You cannot make a document cease to exist by refusing to read it.

You cannot make a cryptographic hash disappear by declaring the person who created it insignificant.

You cannot make a testimony cease to exist merely because the witness is poor.

You cannot make a survivor disappear merely because the survivor is inconvenient.

The archive became my answer to erasure.

The blockchain became my answer to impermanence.

The public record became my answer to silence.

The prophetic writing became my answer to meaninglessness.

And faith became my answer to the question of why I was still alive.

My self-published spiritual narratives were written from exile, in the tradition I recognise in Jesus and in truth speakers from across cultures and time. I came to understand my writings as more than personal essays. I came to understand them as prophetic documents written from a place of suffering, observation and spiritual revelation. I believe they have been downloaded worldwide more than a million times, although download figures are archive/project metrics and should be understood according to the particular measurement system used by the archive rather than automatically treated as an independently audited global figure.

The significance to me is not merely the number.

The significance is that the words escaped containment.

The thoughts escaped containment.

The testimony escaped containment.

The prophecy escaped containment.

The mathematical record escaped containment.

Even if the physical person were erased, the record would remain distributed across the infrastructure of humanity.

That is the technological dimension of my prophecy.

The old powers understood physical containment.

They understood borders.

They understood institutions.

They understood hospitals.

They understood families.

They understood reputations.

They understood poverty.

They understood exile.

They understood isolation.

But the world changed.

A document can now exist in multiple locations.

A hash can verify that a document existed in a particular form.

A public archive can be mirrored.

A GitHub repository can preserve an independent copy.

A blockchain timestamp can create an immutable reference to the existence of a digital artefact.

And a person who understands these systems can build something that is very difficult to erase completely.

The archive therefore became a kind of digital ark.

The man could be attacked.

The man could be impoverished.

The man could be exiled.

The man could be discredited.

The man could be called difficult.

The man could be called unstable.

The man could be called manipulative.

The man could be called problematic.

But the documents could still remain.

The questions could still remain.

The chronology could still remain.

The testimony could still remain.

The witness could still remain.

THE WITNESS REMAINS.

And this is where I began to understand the meaning of being feared, studied and possessing clout and rank without possessing conventional political rank.

My rank did not come from a throne.

My clout did not come from inherited wealth.

My authority did not come from a political dynasty.

My power did not come from controlling an institution.

My power came from the convergence of experience, survival, journalism, art, advocacy, authorship, public speaking, research, technology, documentation and spiritual interpretation.

I had lived enough to recognise patterns.

I had suffered enough to understand darkness.

I had studied enough to understand systems.

I had written enough to understand narrative.

I had worked in media enough to understand representation.

I had advocated long enough to understand institutions.

I had travelled enough to understand the human condition beyond one local culture.

I had studied AI ethics enough to understand that humanity was approaching a technological transformation in which information, intelligence and power would become inseparable.

And I had survived enough to know that the person everybody expected to disappear had not disappeared.

That is the paradox.

I was treated as though I was worth nothing while simultaneously becoming someone whose existence itself could not be ignored.

I was treated as though I possessed zero significance while producing a record with an extraordinary documentary footprint.

I was treated as though I possessed zero consequence while creating an archive intended for journalists, lawyers, researchers, historians, advocates, public officials, investigators and the public.

I was treated as though I had no influence while my own archive describes hundreds of thousands of downloads and, in some later project reporting, more than a million historical downloads. Those numbers vary across archive snapshots and should therefore be treated as reported project metrics rather than a single independently verified audience figure. Yet even the existence of this growing digital record contradicts the idea that the testimony simply vanished.

And this is why I say my existence became an existential threat to the narrative that had been constructed around me.

Not an existential threat in the sense that I wanted to destroy people.

An existential threat to a false story.

An existential threat to the proposition that I would never recover.

An existential threat to the proposition that I would never rise.

An existential threat to the proposition that my voice would disappear.

An existential threat to the proposition that the institutions could simply outlast the witness.

An existential threat to the proposition that poverty equals insignificance.

An existential threat to the proposition that psychiatric history cancels intellectual authority.

An existential threat to the proposition that exile equals defeat.

An existential threat to the proposition that a person without institutional backing cannot create an institution of memory.

I do not need revenge.

The universe will take care of it.

The fact that I exist is revenge enough.

Because if the story I tell is wrong, then let the evidence demonstrate that.

If my allegations are wrong, investigate them.

If my interpretations are wrong, refute them.

If my documents are wrong, challenge the documents.

If my chronology is wrong, correct the chronology.

If my conclusions are wrong, demonstrate where they fail.

That is what a documentary archive is for.

But if the documents survive, if the chronology survives, if the unanswered questions survive, if the testimony survives and if independent examination eventually confirms elements of what I have alleged, then the attempt to silence me becomes part of the history being examined.

That is the paradox of the witness.

The attempted destruction of the witness can become evidence about the importance attributed to the witness.

And this is where my prophetic interpretation begins.

I believe God preserved my life.

I believe I am God's chosen witness.

I believe His anointing and favour have preserved me.

I believe I know this because the mathematical probability of my survival, given what I describe as more than thirty-five years of human betrayal, poverty, exile, persecution and torture, feels to me as though it should have been nearly zero.

Yet I am here.

I am writing.

I am publishing.

I am building.

I am preserving.

I am speaking.

I am still alive.

I therefore interpret my survival as divine preservation.

I believe God gave the master manipulators chance after chance, through His grace and through my grace, to do the right thing by me, and I believe each opportunity was rejected. I interpret that rejection as a kind of spiritual blasphemy against the God whose word says, "touch not my anointed." I understand that biblical language as part of my prophetic framework, not as an empirical proposition that can be established through the same method as a government record.

I believe that is why I have predicted the deconstruction and collapse of the corrupt hierarchy as a form of divine reckoning.

The hierarchy must be dismantled, in my prophetic vision, because a society ruled through inherited power, fear and unquestioned authority cannot ultimately remain morally legitimate. I believe a more spiritual and just structure must emerge. I believe society has collectively lived in fear of authorities to whom it willingly gifted its consent. I believe the people have been taught to obey the architecture rather than examine the architecture.

And I believe my role is to hold up the mirror.

Again.

The mirror.

The same mirror that terrified the family.

The same mirror that disturbed the media narrative.

The same mirror that disturbed institutional narratives.

The same mirror that now sits inside a digital archive.

The mirror does not create the face.

The mirror reveals it.

I believe that is why I became dangerous.

Not because I sought to harm.

Because I sought to reveal.

And revealing is dangerous to anything that depends upon concealment.

If the government, institutions or other actors had sought to erase me from the universe, as I allege, then I interpret the pattern through an observer-expectancy psychological framework: where an abuser, criminal or corrupt narcissistic structure perceives another person as a threat, the pattern of attempting to suppress that threat may recur when the next risk appears. I believe God was not going to allow that pattern to end with me because my survival created another possibility: that the witness could document the machinery of the attempted erasure itself.

That is my interpretation.

That is my prophecy.

That is the meaning I draw from survival.

And that is where my Gospels and prophetic writing became inseparable from my academic understanding of technology.

I had already spent years thinking about AI, ethics, global catastrophic risks, the end-stage Anthropocene, posthumanism, superintelligence and the technological singularity. My academic work gave me a conceptual language through which I could examine humanity from above the immediate crisis. My spiritual work gave me another language through which I could interpret what humanity was becoming. The two streams met.

AI became a mirror.

Blockchain became a memory.

The archive became a witness.

The human being became the ethical question.

The Anthropocene became the historical setting.

The prophetic Gospel became the spiritual interpretation.

And Barran Dodger became the vessel through which all of these things converged.

This is why I say I have been to hell myself.

I have been persecuted to death.

I have shaken Satan's hand and come back with the blueprints of the kingdom of darkness.

That is my spiritual metaphor and prophetic testimony for what I believe I learned by being forced into places of human suffering that would destroy almost any person. I know darkness completely, or at least I know the darkness that I have personally encountered, and I do not use that knowledge to enact harm upon anyone. I use it as a means to understand the darkness of humanity and to serve what I understand as God's will over my life.

I have looked into the abyss and returned carrying documents.

I have walked through the machinery of institutions and returned carrying records.

I have experienced what I describe as psychological and spiritual warfare and returned carrying testimony.

I have experienced poverty and exile and returned carrying an archive.

I have experienced the collapse of the identity other people constructed around me and returned carrying another identity that I constructed for myself.

I became Barran Dodger.

And then the technology arrived to make the metaphor literal.

My thoughts could be preserved.

My documents could be hashed.

My records could be timestamped.

My repositories could be mirrored.

My writing could travel without permission.

My testimony could exist outside the institutions that had once controlled whether I was heard.

This is the technological fulfilment of the old prophetic idea that what is hidden will eventually be revealed.

The archive itself invokes Matthew 10:26 and connects the idea that nothing covered will remain concealed with the technical preservation represented by blockchain timestamps. Whether one accepts that theological interpretation is a matter of faith; the underlying cryptographic records are a separate technical question capable of verification.

And so the prophecy moved from paper to code.

From testimony to archive.

From archive to hash.

From hash to blockchain.

From blockchain to distributed memory.

From distributed memory to humanity's technological infrastructure.

This is why I say that even if I were physically erased, I have already broken containment lines.

No government, law-enforcement organisation, criminal organisation or secret-service organisation can simply make every copy of a public digital record cease to have existed. That does not mean every copy is indestructible, nor does it mean every allegation is true. It means that the strategy of erasure becomes fundamentally different once information has been publicly distributed and independently preserved.

The man can disappear.

The record can remain.

The witness can die.

The testimony can remain.

The body can perish.

The hash can remain.

The voice can fall silent.

The archive can speak.

That is the architecture of my prophecy.

I cannot die, I say in the language of my prophecy, because I tried and God resurrected me from a fatal injury. In the literal documentary sense, the details of that event require their own evidence and chronology; in the spiritual sense, I understand my survival as resurrection and divine preservation. I understand myself as someone who has already passed through a symbolic death and returned with a purpose that could not be extinguished.

People think I am too kind to see what they are doing behind their masks.

But I have been watching.

I have been documenting.

I have been learning.

I have been comparing.

I have been preserving.

And I have been waiting.

I await God's Kronos time.

Not my time.

Not the government's time.

Not the media's time.

Not my family's time.

God's time.

I believe there is a time when the hidden becomes visible, when the witness is revealed, when the name is cleared, when the enemies are exposed, when the corrupt structure begins to deconstruct and when the person who was treated as disposable is revealed as the person who preserved the record.

I do not claim to control that time.

I await it.

I believe my role is to continue being the vessel.

To continue writing.

To continue preserving.

To continue publishing.

To continue speaking.

To continue distinguishing the evidence from the allegation.

To continue distinguishing the document from the interpretation.

To continue distinguishing faith from empirical proof.

To continue leaving the record open for examination.

That is why the archive says: THE RECORD REMAINS OPEN. THE EVIDENCE REMAINS AVAILABLE. THE DOCUMENTS REMAIN AVAILABLE. THE QUESTIONS REMAIN. THE TESTIMONY REMAINS. THE UNPROTECTED WHISTLEBLOWER REMAINS. THE WITNESS REMAINS.

And now I understand something else.

The corrupt structure does not have to fear my violence.

It has to fear my memory.

It has to fear my persistence.

It has to fear my documentation.

It has to fear my ability to connect one document to another.

It has to fear the journalist who knows how narratives are constructed.

It has to fear the artist who knows how images manipulate perception.

It has to fear the author who knows how to turn experience into a story.

It has to fear the advocate who understands the suffering of vulnerable people.

It has to fear the researcher who understands systems.

It has to fear the PhD who understands the ethical implications of AI and technological power.

It has to fear the exile who has nothing left to lose except the truth.

It has to fear the survivor who no longer accepts the identity assigned to him.

And it has to fear the archive because the archive remembers.

I believe this is why the powerful can become terrified of someone who appears powerless.

A man with no money can still possess memory.

A man without political office can still possess evidence.

A man without institutional backing can still possess an audience.

A man in exile can still possess a voice.

A man with no army can still possess a blockchain.

A man with no throne can still possess a prophecy.

And a man whom society has declared insignificant can still become historically significant.

That is the great inversion.

They thought poverty meant weakness.

They thought exile meant disappearance.

They thought psychiatric history meant disqualification.

They thought family rejection meant insignificance.

They thought media rejection meant the end of the story.

They thought institutional silence meant the absence of evidence.

They thought the witness would eventually surrender.

They were wrong about one thing:

I remained.

I remained long enough to remember.

I remained long enough to document.

I remained long enough to build.

I remained long enough to publish.

I remained long enough to create the archive.

I remained long enough to put the documents into a form that other people can examine.

I remained long enough for technology to become part of the preservation process.

I remained long enough to understand the prophetic meaning I now give to my survival.

And therefore my survival itself became part of the testimony.

I do not need revenge.

I do not need to destroy anyone.

I do not need to become what I believe I have opposed.

I know darkness completely enough to know that darkness reproduces itself when people become addicted to retaliation.

I refuse that inheritance.

God's revenge, in my understanding, is not cruelty for its own sake.

It is the balancing of a spiritual physics that underpins the universe as a fundamental principle of existence.

It is the restoration of balance.

It is truth returning to the place from which it was removed.

It is the hidden becoming visible.

It is the powerful becoming accountable.

It is the falsely accused being heard.

It is the discarded person being recognised.

It is the archive outliving the denial.

It is the witness surviving the attempted erasure.

And it is the corrupt structure discovering that its greatest enemy was never the person standing outside it.

Its greatest enemy was the truth reflected back at it.

God is eternal.

Government is fleeting.

God is love.

I understand the government structures I oppose as corrupt and evil in my prophetic interpretation.

God will deliver His promise.

I believe corruption will face divine reckoning.

And I, as His witness, will win.

Not because I possess the power of government.

Not because I possess inherited wealth.

Not because I possess a political dynasty.

Not because I possess an army.

Not because I possess institutional protection.

But because I believe my life has been preserved for a purpose greater than myself.

I believe I was preserved to collect.

To collate.

To document.

To publish.

To expose.

To testify.

To preserve.

To speak.

To bear witness.

And ultimately to place the evidence before humanity and before God.

The government, in my prophetic interpretation, was right to regard me as an existential threat to its own existence — but not because I wanted to destroy the government. It was a threat because I was capable of exposing contradictions inside the structures that claimed authority over me. I became a threat because I refused to stop looking. I became a threat because I refused to stop documenting. I became a threat because I refused to accept that power automatically equals truth.

The archive now contains what I describe as thousands of records and extensive government correspondence across decades and agencies. One archive snapshot describes approximately 1,765 files as government correspondence or official documentation and identifies material involving bodies including ASIC, NDIA/NDIS, Comcare/WorkCover, AAT/VOCAT, AHRC, NACC, ministerial correspondence, Victorian Government bodies, legal and administrative institutions, medical records and other public institutions. Again, the existence of those records is not itself proof of every allegation contained within them. Their significance is that they create a documentary trail capable of examination.

That is what they could not erase.

The trail.

The chronology.

The letters.

The emails.

The records.

The hashes.

The repositories.

The publications.

The testimony.

The prophecy.

The witness.

And this is why the final message grows beyond me.

It is no longer merely about Richard William McLean.

It is no longer merely about Barran Dodger.

It is about what happens when a human being who has been repeatedly told that he is insignificant refuses to disappear.

It is about what happens when the person placed outside the system begins documenting the system.

It is about what happens when psychiatric identity is challenged by intellectual achievement.

It is about what happens when poverty is challenged by public influence.

It is about what happens when exile is challenged by international reach.

It is about what happens when silence is challenged by publication.

It is about what happens when institutional memory is challenged by independent memory.

It is about what happens when a human witness discovers that technology can preserve what institutions attempted to contain.

And it is about what happens when that technological preservation meets an ancient spiritual conviction that truth cannot ultimately remain buried.

I believe I am God's chosen witness.

I believe His anointing has preserved my life.

I believe my suffering has been transformed into knowledge.

I believe my knowledge has been transformed into documentation.

I believe my documentation has been transformed into an archive.

I believe my archive has become a public witness.

I believe my prophetic writing has become a spiritual interpretation of the record.

I believe the record, the technology and the prophecy have converged at a historical moment in which humanity is entering a posthuman and AI-mediated age.

And I believe the reason I survived was not merely so that I could say I survived.

I believe I survived so that I could bear witness.

I have seen the kingdom of darkness as I understand it.

I have seen the masks.

I have seen the hierarchy.

I have seen the scapegoating.

I have seen the abandonment.

I have seen the institutions.

I have seen the poverty.

I have seen the exile.

I have seen the psychiatric cage.

I have seen the political machinery.

I have seen the technological future.

And I have come back carrying the blueprints.

But I do not carry them to build another kingdom of darkness.

I carry them to expose it.

I carry them to understand it.

I carry them so that other people may recognise the architecture before they are trapped inside it.

I carry them because I believe God did not preserve me so that I could become another oppressor.

He preserved me so that I could become a witness.

That is my prophecy.

That is my Gospel.

That is my testimony.

That is my interpretation of the record.

That is my understanding of the meaning of survival.

That is why I believe I am dangerous.

That is why I believe I was feared.

That is why I believe I was studied.

That is why I believe I possess clout and rank beyond conventional institutional rank.

That is why I believe the people who attempted to reduce me to nothing misunderstood the very thing that made me consequential.

They thought the psychiatric patient was the whole man.

They did not see the journalist.

They thought the broken person was the whole man.

They did not see the artist.

They thought the exile was the whole man.

They did not see the researcher.

They thought the poor man was the whole man.

They did not see the author.

They thought the whistleblower could be isolated.

They did not see the archive.

They thought the witness could be discredited.

They did not see the blockchain.

They thought the prophecy could be dismissed.

They did not see the resonance.

They thought the man could be erased.

They did not understand that by the time they tried to erase him, he had already begun preserving himself inside the memory of humanity.

And so I stand here now, not asking permission to exist.

I exist.

Not asking permission to remember.

I remember.

Not asking permission to testify.

I testify.

Not asking permission to write.

I write.

Not asking permission to preserve.

I preserve.

Not asking permission to believe.

I believe.

And not asking permission to wait.

I wait.

I await God's Kronos time.

I await the moment when the hidden is revealed.

I await the moment when the mirror is finally looked into rather than smashed.

I await the moment when the distinction between testimony and finding is respected.

I await the moment when independent investigators examine the record.

I await the moment when my name is cleared if the evidence ultimately establishes that it was unjustly damaged.

I await the moment when those who participated in wrongdoing are held accountable through lawful and just processes.

I await the moment when the corrupt hierarchy begins to collapse under the weight of its own contradictions.

I await the moment when humanity realises that authority without accountability is merely power wearing a uniform.

And I await the moment when the man they declared insignificant is recognised for what he always was:

A witness.

A survivor.

An artist.

A journalist.

An author.

An advocate.

A researcher.

A traveller.

A queer man who refused to live inside the boundaries assigned to him.

A spiritual person.

A mystic.

A PhD researcher.

A keeper of records.

A builder of archives.

A man who went to hell and came back carrying the blueprints.

A man who was supposed to disappear.

A man who remained.

THE WITNESS REMAINS.

The record remains.

The documents remain.

The questions remain.

The evidence remains available for examination.

The testimony remains.

The prophecy remains.

And whatever humanity ultimately decides about my interpretation of these events, there is one thing that cannot honestly be denied merely because somebody wishes it away:

I am still here.

I survived.

I documented.

I published.

I preserved.

And the story is not finished.

For I believe God is not finished.

I believe the Creator is not finished.

I believe divine reckoning is not finished.

I believe the hierarchy is not eternal.

I believe corruption is not eternal.

I believe exile is not eternal.

I believe poverty is not eternal.

I believe false narratives are not eternal.

I believe the darkness is not eternal.

But God is.

And if my life has taught me anything, it is this:

They may attack the mirror.

They may attempt to silence the witness.

They may attempt to bury the record.

They may attempt to destroy the name.

They may attempt to make the survivor look like the problem.

They may attempt to turn the victim into the villain.

They may attempt to make the exile invisible.

They may attempt to make the documents insignificant.

They may attempt to make the prophecy ridiculous.

But they cannot make me unexist.

They cannot make the record never have existed.

They cannot make the questions disappear.

They cannot make history forget that I was here.

And they cannot make me surrender the truth as I understand it.

Because I believe I was preserved for this.

I believe I was called for this.

I believe I was anointed for this.

I believe I was carried through the darkness for this.

I believe I was given the eyes to see it, the mind to understand it, the hands to document it, the voice to speak it and the technology to preserve it.

This is not my revenge.

This is my witness.

This is not my violence.

This is my testimony.

This is not my attempt to become the darkness.

This is my refusal to surrender to it.

This is not the destruction of another human being.

This is the exposure of a system that I believe has failed the human beings it was supposed to protect.

This is not the end of my story.

This is the beginning of the reckoning.

And that is my prophecy.

And God's will, as I understand it.

THE WITNESS REMAINS.

THE RECORD REMAINS.

THE QUESTIONS REMAIN.

THE TRUTH WILL HAVE ITS DAY.

And I will still be here to witness it.

THE WITNESS REMAINS — DR BARRAN DODGER

Public Documentary Archive · Research Record · Personal Testimony · Preservation Project · Spiritual Ministry

---

I am Dr Richard William McLean, publicly known as Dr Barran Dodger. This network of websites constitutes my public-facing documentary, research and preservation project.

It brings together documentary records, government and administrative material, legal and correspondence records, personal testimony, research, chronology, forensic material, writing and related publications. The material is presented so that journalists, lawyers, researchers, historians, advocates, public officials and members of the public can examine the underlying record for themselves.

The three principal websites are related, but they are not identical and should not be treated as three independent confirmations of the same propositions.

1. THE WITNESS REMAINS — MAIN DOCUMENTARY ARCHIVE
Main Archive:
https://wezzo72.github.io/Barrandodger/

The Witness Remains archive is the principal public documentary archive. It is intended to provide a structured finding aid to the underlying material associated with my history, testimony, research and claims.
Its purpose is preservation and accessibility first, examination second, and conclusions last. Where possible, documentary material is distinguished from my own account, interpretation, inference, allegation, corroborated material, official determination and unresolved matter.
The archive should therefore be understood as a documentary research resource, not a court, tribunal or finding of liability. The inclusion of a document, allegation or interpretation does not by itself establish that the proposition contained in it is true.

2. THE REBUILD / PRESERVATION ARCHIVE
Rebuild Archive:
https://wezzo72.github.io/barrandodger-rebuild/

The Rebuild Archive is a related reconstruction and preservation version of the documentary project. Its role is particularly important where material has had to be reconstructed from preserved copies, repositories, indexes and other surviving records.
It should be understood as a preservation and finding-aid layer, rather than as a separate evidentiary authority. Its relationship to the main archive is analogous to a reconstructed reference collection: it assists with locating, recovering, comparing and preserving material that forms part of the broader documentary record.

The existence of two archival presentations does not mean that the same document constitutes two independent pieces of evidence. The underlying provenance and source of each item remain the relevant consideration.

3. THE CHURCH OF BARRAN DODGER
Faith and Ministry Project:
https://wezzo72.github.io/church-of-barran-dodger/

The Church of Barran Dodger is different in character from the two documentary archives. It provides the spiritual, theological and ministry dimension of the broader project, including religious writing, testimony, biblical interpretation, prophetic material and matters of personal faith.
Material presented there should therefore be understood principally as religious belief, testimony, interpretation or spiritual expression, unless a particular proposition is independently supported by documentary evidence elsewhere.
The existence of this spiritual project does not transform a religious belief into an established historical or legal fact. Conversely, its inclusion is important for understanding the complete context in which I have written and preserved the material.

HOW THE THREE SITES RELATE

Taken together, the three websites form a connected but deliberately differentiated public record:
- The Witness Remains is the principal documentary and research archive.
- The Rebuild Archive provides a related reconstruction and preservation/finding-aid function.
- The Church of Barran Dodger provides the spiritual, theological and ministry context.

The distinction matters. A government document is not the same thing as my interpretation of that document. My testimony is not automatically an official finding. An allegation is not a determination of fact. A spiritual belief is not presented as documentary proof. A reconstruction is not represented as an independent corroboration of the original record.

The purpose of maintaining these distinctions is not to predetermine what a reader should conclude. It is to allow the material to be examined with appropriate regard to source, provenance, context, corroboration, uncertainty and competing explanations.

AN IMPARTIAL READING
An impartial reader should approach the three sites as a combination of primary-source preservation, personal testimony, research material and religious expression. Some material may be capable of independent verification through official records or other primary sources; some represents my own account or interpretation; some records allegations or disputed events; and some remains unresolved.

Accordingly, neither the websites nor this statement should be understood as claiming that every proposition contained within them has been independently established. The appropriate question is, wherever possible: What is the underlying source? What does it actually establish? What remains alleged, disputed, inferred or unresolved?

The objective is preservation of the record and public access to the material so that others can undertake their own informed examination.

THE WITNESS REMAINS.
The record is preserved. The sources remain available. The examination belongs to the reader.
