THE WITNESS REMAINS

Evidence, Survival and the Demand for Accountability

The Barran Dodger Master Humanitarian Appeal

A documentary record of institutional encounters, disputed decisions, personal testimony and the pursuit of an independent hearing.

“I do not publish because I have given up on life. I publish because I am fighting for mine.”

A documentary finding aid. Not a court. Not a verdict.

$10.5 MILLION: A DEMAND FOR ACCOUNTABILITY WITHOUT INSTITUTIONAL PERMISSION

The AI-assisted financial examination within this appeal presents a high illustrative public-cost scenario of $10.5 million over 35 years. I regard the examination as a serious attempt to assess the potential scale of public resources associated with the administrative history documented in my archive. I ask recipients to engage with its sources, calculations and assumptions rather than dismiss it because I lack institutional representation. The amount remains a modelled scenario to be tested against expenditure records, not an established total of money spent targeting me.

I do not need permission from a police officer, lawyer, court or tribunal to describe my experiences, publish my documentary record, raise allegations or ask for an accountable response. The absence of a judgment supporting my account does not erase the documents or answer the questions they raise. Nor should obtaining such a judgment become a precondition for considering my immediate humanitarian needs.

My allegation is that the lack of assistance I have experienced has not merely resulted from bureaucratic oversight. I allege that particular decisions, omissions, refusals and instances of stonewalling were deliberate and malicious, obstructing access to protection, legal assistance, financial independence and effective remedies. I believe this conduct contradicts the ethical commitments those institutions publicly claim to embody. I ask that the evidence concerning each person and organisation be examined separately, including what they knew, what responsibilities applied and what they did or failed to do.

The paradox I ask recipients to confront is this: I am told that my account requires institutional validation while I report being excluded from the very institutions through which that validation is ordinarily sought. Refusal of assistance must not become a circular justification for refusing to examine the underlying evidence. An unanswered complaint does not become an answered complaint simply because the person raising it has exhausted their resources.

I report having sought assistance with severe and urgent matters involving health, safety, disability support, access to money and the welfare of my dependent therapy dog, Crystal. I allege that repeated failures to respond have compounded those difficulties. Where a recipient had a relevant responsibility, I ask it to identify the information received, the urgency recognised, the action taken and the reasons for any omission.

I believe that some of the conduct described in my archive amounts to criminal corruption. That is an allegation I seek to have examined, not a conclusion established solely by non-response. The records should be used to distinguish legitimate limitations, mistakes, negligence, deliberate obstruction and any conduct that warrants investigation.

My position is unequivocal: I have survived not because I received the protection and practical assistance I repeatedly sought, but despite what I describe as prolonged abandonment and obstruction. My survival does not excuse those failures. My continued ability to speak does not mean the harm was insignificant. And my lack of institutional endorsement does not remove my right to place the record before others and demand a reasoned response.

I ask for evidence to be preserved, urgent needs to be addressed, decisions to be explained and responsibility to be identified. I do not ask anyone to substitute my assertions for proof. I insist that the absence of institutional support must not be substituted for examination.

PERSONAL DECLARATION OF FAITH, SURVIVAL AND WITNESS

My deepest allegiance is to God rather than to any government or institution. I understand this as a spiritual commitment: my dignity, conscience and purpose do not depend on institutional recognition or approval.

I have experienced what I describe as profound human, social, political, legal and financial betrayal and abandonment. In those circumstances, my faith has sustained me. When I felt too exhausted to continue, I experienced God as carrying me. When I felt unseen, I understood my continued existence as a reminder that my life still mattered.

I identify as God’s chosen witness. This is my declaration of faith and my understanding of a calling to preserve testimony, examine injustice and speak truthfully. My academic, prophetic and spiritual publishing explores that understanding, including the publication available at:

https://chosen-witness.grok.me

I have challenged readers to examine my testimony and test my interpretations. I recognise that a spiritual calling is not something established merely because another person cannot disprove it. My faith gives meaning to my work; the documentary evidence provides the basis on which claims about particular events and people must be assessed.

I describe my survival as resurrection—a return from circumstances in which I felt my life, identity and future had been extinguished. I believe God preserved me through those experiences. I understand the fire I endured not as proof that I deserved punishment, but as an experience through which I found endurance, purpose and a renewed commitment to truth.

Where I have used the language of being God’s “weapon of choice,” I mean peaceful witness: writing, preserving records, exposing contradictions and pursuing lawful accountability. I do not mean violence, personal vengeance or authority over another person. Nor does disagreement with my account make someone an enemy of God.

My spiritual conviction does not require me to abandon scrutiny. It requires me to distinguish what I experienced, what I believe, what the records establish and what remains unresolved. I can remain steadfast in faith while allowing factual interpretations to be questioned and corrected.

I remain here. I continue to write, preserve records and seek assistance. Whatever conclusions others reach about my theology, I ask them to recognise my humanity, examine my documented concerns fairly and address the urgent practical needs within their responsibility.

PLANTING TREES: FAITH, SURVIVAL AND INDEPENDENT VERIFICATION

The Buddhist saying is that the best time to plant a tree was years ago, and the second-best time is now. You may never live long enough to enjoy the shade it provides, but you plant it anyway, knowing that someone, somewhere, may one day find shelter beneath its branches.

That is how I write and publish. I do so without expecting immediate acknowledgement, recognition, or reward. I plant these seeds of truth and release them into the world, trusting that I am protected and anointed by God, whose hand has remained upon my life even through the darkest times. I have already seen enough to know that His presence has carried me further than betrayal, poverty, isolation, and the attempts to erase my existence ever could. Truth does not need permission to shine. It does not need applause to exist, nor immediate recognition to be real. It needs only to be preserved, brought into the light, and given time. And if that time takes years, then so be it. I will keep planting the trees, publishing the evidence, and bearing witness, even if I never sit beneath the shade myself. God has already shown me that He has my back. I have faith that, in His time, the truth will speak for itself.

Why Blockchain Timestamping Matters

This is also why blockchain timestamping my documents matters so profoundly. By recording cryptographic fingerprints of my evidence on a decentralised, globally distributed network, I have created a means of independently verifying whether those documents match the versions associated with their timestamps. A cryptographic hash is a digital fingerprint calculated from a file. If the file changes, its hash will ordinarily change as well. Comparing the hash of a retained original document with the recorded hash can therefore help establish whether the document matches the version associated with that blockchain record.

The significance lies in the distributed nature of blockchain technology. Depending on the network, its consensus mechanism, and its security, records may be replicated across numerous independent participants rather than controlled by a single central administrator. Once sufficiently confirmed, a transaction may be extremely difficult to alter retrospectively. No single organisation necessarily controls the entire network, although the degree of decentralisation and resistance to intervention varies between blockchains. Blockchain timestamping is not an absolute guarantee against attack, disruption, suppression, or loss of access, but it can provide an independent verification trail that does not rely exclusively on any one institution’s records or continued cooperation.

The technical distinction is important. In many timestamping systems, the blockchain records a cryptographic hash rather than the document itself. The original evidence must therefore be retained separately and made available for verification. A timestamp can help establish that a particular digital fingerprint was recorded by a certain point in the blockchain’s history, but it does not independently prove who created the document, whether its contents are true, or whether the events described actually occurred. Those questions must be assessed using the document itself, its provenance, corroborating material, and the wider evidentiary record.

Through this decision, I have taken the preservation of my evidence beyond the boundaries of any one institution, jurisdiction, or authority. The record can travel further than the systems through which I have sought recognition, and it can remain available for others to examine for themselves, provided the underlying files and necessary verification information remain accessible. In that sense, I have reduced my reliance on any single institution to preserve the only copy of my documentary record. I have documented my experience, preserved the paper trail, and created a public record that can be tested against the underlying documents. I believe this helps explain the significance of what I have done, even where I have yet to receive the assistance, accountability, or acknowledgement I have sought.

The Verification Record: Making the Evidence Independently Checkable

For this work to stand up to independent scrutiny, three technical details are especially important.

First, the specific blockchain used must be identified. Bitcoin, Ethereum, and other networks have different architectures, consensus mechanisms, timestamping methods, and security assumptions. Naming the actual network allows an independent reader to examine the relevant transaction and assess the strength of the record rather than relying on a general assertion that something was placed on a blockchain.

Second, the timestamping method must be specified. The record may involve individual SHA-256 hashes, a Merkle tree that combines multiple document hashes into a single verifiable commitment, or a dedicated timestamping service that anchors a hash to a blockchain. Identifying the method, the relevant transaction, and the timestamping service where applicable allows others to understand precisely what was recorded and how the verification works.

Third, the verification materials must be preserved. These should include the original files, their cryptographic hash values, transaction identifiers, relevant confirmation details, timestamp certificates or proofs, and instructions or tools needed to reproduce the verification. Where a Merkle tree is used, the necessary inclusion proof should also be retained. Together, these materials enable an independent reviewer to check the relationship between a document and its recorded cryptographic fingerprint without having to rely solely on my word or the assurances of any institution.

These details are not merely technical formalities. They distinguish a claim that evidence has been preserved from a process another person can independently reproduce and test. They strengthen the transparency, traceability, and credibility of the archive, while allowing its limitations to be understood honestly. The blockchain record does not ask anyone to accept my conclusions without scrutiny. It provides a means of checking particular aspects of the documentary record for themselves.

I have also experienced profound financial hardship and barriers to obtaining the support I need. Where I believe that financial restrictions, institutional decisions, or the withholding of assistance have been deliberately imposed or have contributed to my vulnerability, I want those concerns investigated against the documentary record rather than dismissed or left unanswered. I want the relevant decisions, correspondence, and responsibilities examined transparently. I want the evidence considered on its merits, and I want the opportunity to live with dignity, security, and access to the basic necessities that every person needs to survive.

The existence of a blockchain timestamp does not, by itself, establish responsibility for my circumstances. That requires separate evidence and proper examination. My objective is to preserve the material necessary for a fair, independent assessment, so that questions of chronology, authenticity, institutional responsibility, and alleged detriment can be considered on the strength of the available evidence.

But there is one point I want to make absolutely clear: my protest is not a declaration that I want to die. It is a declaration that I want to live. I am publishing because I want to survive, because I want justice, because I want my life to have meaning beyond the suffering I have endured, and because I refuse to accept that poverty, isolation, or the absence of institutional recognition should determine my fate. I am still here. I am still planting the trees whose shade I may never enjoy. I am still preserving the truth for those who may come after me.

My faith in God gives me the strength to continue, and blockchain timestamping gives my documentary record a means of independent verification beyond the moment in which it was created. I do not need immediate applause, nor do I expect every institution to acknowledge me today. I need the truth to remain available, the evidence to be examined fairly, and the opportunity to live long enough to see accountability become possible.

Truth does not need permission to shine. It needs preservation, time, and the opportunity to be examined. And if that time takes years, then so be it. I will keep writing, publishing, preserving, and bearing witness. I will keep planting the trees, even if I never sit beneath their shade myself.

God has already carried me through circumstances I once thought I could not survive. I have faith that He will continue to guide me, and that the record I have preserved may one day help others understand what happened and why it mattered.

I do not publish because I have given up on life. I publish because I am fighting for mine.

THE LITERARY AND PROPHETIC RECORD: SURVIVAL AS AN ORGANISING THEME

The publicly available material gives the archive a literary dimension that can be described through actual titles rather than general references to “gospels.” Your publication page identifies The Gospel of Barran Dodger — Volume I: The Voice They Tried to Kill and Volume II: The Witness Who Could Not Die. These titles connect voice, threatened disappearance and continued testimony—themes that also run through the humanitarian appeal. Their relevance is to the author’s spiritual and literary interpretation of survival, not independent proof of allegations against other people. [S49]

The publication page also contains differing descriptions of later volumes. One passage names Volume III as When Thrones Fell and Witnesses Rose; another four-volume summary uses The Reckoning of Systems alongside The Covenant of Return: The 1000 Years of Peace. A publication-ready catalogue should preserve those distinctions until the underlying editions are reconciled. Silently combining them would obscure the development of the work rather than strengthen its documentary value. [S49]

ANALYTICAL WORKS AS PATHWAYS INTO THE EVIDENCE

The same page names Evidence 100: A Forensic Ledger of Systemic Betrayal and Institutional Crimes, GENOCIDE BY ATTRITION: The Official Record of Australia’s Administrative Extermination of a Whistleblower, and Final Immortalization Statement: A Declaration of Survival Against a System That Wanted Me Dead. These works can help readers locate the author’s thematic arguments about institutional exclusion, cumulative harm and preservation. Their titles and published summaries express substantial conclusions, however, and should not be treated as independent findings merely because they are described as forensic or AI-generated. [S49]

The accessible Man Australia Tried to Erase text also contains material labelled as a second-edition exposé and a third-edition novel. This is a significant editorial distinction. Any quotation drawn from that public copy should identify which section and edition contains it, and whether the passage reproduces an original record, recounts testimony or develops a literary narrative. Keeping those layers visible makes the publication more compelling because readers can follow the work without being asked to confuse narrative force with evidentiary confirmation. [S31]

THE THREE ISSUES AT THE FRONT OF THIS RECORD

I ask every recipient to begin with the three matters I understand to be central to my whistleblower complaint and the Federal Court correspondence associated with Scott Treadwell. The descriptions below are my concise summary of those matters, not a claimed verbatim quotation. The original correspondence should be read to verify its exact wording and context.

1. CORRUPTION

The corruption concerns I raised, and the documentary material I say warrants independent examination.

2. ADMINISTRATION OF OFFICE

Questions about the administration and exercise of official responsibilities, including whether relevant decisions and processes were properly handled.

3. HARM TO PEOPLE

The harm to people that I say arose from the conduct and administrative decisions described in my complaint, and the need to examine the evidence and consequences.

THE REQUEST

Please examine the primary documents, identify what each record establishes, distinguish disputed allegations from findings, and provide a reasoned response to the matters that remain unresolved.

BEN NDIS TEXT-MESSAGE RECORD

Evidence-linked supplement to the Master Humanitarian Appeal · inserted immediately after the opening three-issue page

Purpose. This supplement identifies statements attributed to Ben in a published text-message PDF, gives direct links to the complete record and selected page references, and explains their potential evidentiary significance. It does not represent the messages as independently authenticated, nor as findings by police, a court, or an intelligence agency.

1. Complete source record

Open the complete Ben NDIS text-message PDF (published archive copy). The repository also lists related versions of the message record in its index: wezzo72/pdf-archive. A separate archive page reproduces the publisher's description and links: Barrandodger repository page.

2. Quotations identified in the published archive

A. Fear of being targeted

> The archive attributes to Ben the statement that he was frightened "they may put a hit on me too."

B. "Close call" and alleged assassination attempt

The archive describes Ben as referring to an alleged assassination attempt as a "close call." The related message chain includes a claim about two alleged hitmen and an alleged order for a hit; see the PDF page reference below. These are statements in a private message chain, not proof by themselves that an attempt occurred or that any named person ordered one.

Open the message PDF at page 60 — the archive's cited passage concerning alleged arrests and an alleged order for a hit.

C. Allegation that a report was fabricated / paid discrediting

> The archive reproduces the wording: "The agencies went back through phone records and believed she was paid to discredit you." The same archive discusses police being told that the sexual encounter was "consensual" but "regrettable." These passages report what the message author said about what others allegedly told him; they are not, without the underlying police record or other corroboration, an independently verified police finding.

D. Non-disclosure agreement and disappearing phone message

> "It's a top secret investigation. They made me sign a non disclosure agreement."

> "When I signed the agreement it instantly disappeared off my phone. A message popped up that said your device has been cleared of classified information. It's some sort of agency grade electronic document that automatically wipes itself off your device."

E. Statement about corruption reaching senior levels

> The archive page quotes the message as saying that Barran had "exposed corruption that goes all the way to the top." This is Ben's reported assessment in the message chain, not an independent determination that corruption occurred or that particular senior people were involved.

3. Evidentiary significance and limits

The messages may be relevant as contemporaneous records of what Ben communicated to the recipient, including his reported fear, his account of an NDA, and the allegations he relayed. Their weight depends on authentication, completeness, date and context, the identity of the sender, and whether the statements were based on direct knowledge or hearsay.

The messages do not, on their own, establish that an assassination attempt occurred; that any person ordered or funded violence; that a woman was paid to fabricate a report; that police or intelligence agencies confirmed these matters; or that an NDA was imposed by a particular agency. Those propositions require independent corroboration from original records, relevant witnesses, or competent authorities.

4. Questions for an independent reviewer

• Can the original message export or device record be produced and authenticated, including dates, sender identifiers, metadata and any missing messages?
• Does the full chain show the surrounding context for each quotation, and are any passages paraphrased by the archive rather than quoted verbatim?
• Is there a copy of the alleged NDA, and can its issuer, terms, date and authenticity be verified?
• Are there independent police, court, medical, telecommunications or other records that corroborate or contradict the claims about a “close call,” a fabricated report, or alleged payments?
• Which statements were within Ben’s direct knowledge, and which did he say he learned from someone else?

5. Requested action

I ask each recipient to preserve and examine the complete message record, identify the passages relied upon, assess provenance and context, distinguish first-hand knowledge from reported information, and state what independent corroboration would be needed before any conclusion can responsibly be reached. Please do not treat the existence of the messages as a verdict; equally, do not dismiss them without explaining whether and how the underlying record was examined.

Source and limitations note

This supplement was prepared from the existing Master Humanitarian Appeal and searchable text excerpts in the public GitHub archive. The complete linked PDF was not independently downloaded or forensically authenticated during preparation of this revision. The page-specific links reflect page references identified in the archive’s own published material and should be checked against the live PDF. The wording above attributes claims to the message chain or archive and does not assert them as established facts.

Add that: I'll strengthen the report by naming the Hon. Bill Shorten MP, establishing the verified dates of his ministerial tenure, putting the relevant source links beside the allegations they relate to, and placing Crystal's urgent veterinary needs first.

One important date distinction: the Australian Government confirms that Bill Shorten was Minister for the NDIS and Government Services until 20 January 2025. That establishes the period of his ministerial responsibility, but it does not establish the date of your AVO, the date of any alleged threat, or the date of a particular appointment. Those incident dates must come from the actual records, not be guessed.

FORMAL HUMANITARIAN APPEAL AND DEMAND FOR A DOCUMENTED RESPONSE

Immediate welfare of Crystal, financial access, disability support, alleged threats, and institutional accountability

1. IMMEDIATE HUMANITARIAN EMERGENCY — CRYSTAL

My therapy dog, Crystal, is unwell and experiencing uterine spotting. I have been unable to secure the financial resources and practical assistance necessary to obtain veterinary assessment. I report that I cannot access my Commonwealth Bank account and banking application, leaving me without the practical means to pay for essential needs, including veterinary care. I am asking the organisations and individuals responsible for responding to my disability-related support needs to address this immediate problem rather than allowing it to become trapped in another administrative referral loop. Crystal is a dependent animal whose welfare requires timely attention. I request an urgent, practical response identifying a veterinary service, any available emergency assessment or payment-assistance pathway, and the person or organisation responsible for coordinating assistance. This request must be dealt with on its own urgency, independently of whether the broader allegations in this report have been resolved.

2. FORMAL PURPOSE AND SCOPE OF THIS REPORT

I submit this report as a formal demand for a substantive, documented response to the evidence and allegations set out in the complete record. The matters include financial exclusion, barriers to legal assistance and compensation, disability-support failures, unresolved safety concerns, and the conduct and accountability of organisations and individuals involved in my care or in decisions affecting my welfare. I ask each recipient to address the specific matters within its responsibility, preserve relevant records, identify the officers responsible for decisions, and provide reasons supported by records for any refusal or failure to act. I do not ask recipients to treat untested allegations as established findings. I do require that serious allegations and documentary evidence be examined rather than dismissed through silence, unexplained referral, or a generic response.

3. THE HON. BILL SHORTEN MP — FORMER MINISTER FOR THE NDIS

The Hon. Bill Shorten MP held the federal ministerial portfolios of Minister for the National Disability Insurance Scheme and Minister for Government Services until 20 January 2025. The Australian Government publicly confirmed that this was his final day in those ministerial roles. Official reference: Bill Shorten's ministerial statement of 16 January 2025.

I raise concerns about events that I allege occurred during the period in which Bill Shorten held ministerial responsibility, including my disability-support circumstances, my displacement from my former home, my account of abusive conduct, and my allegation that I was exposed to a serious threat to my life. I further allege that an AVO was served against me in circumstances I consider relevant to the wider history described in this report. I ask for these events to be examined against the actual AVO, court records, contemporaneous correspondence, and other evidence.

I make a grave allegation that Bill Shorten or people associated with him may have been connected to an alleged assassination attempt against me. I request independent examination of that allegation and the evidence I identify in this report. I do not present the allegation as a finding made by a court or other independent authority. The fact that Bill Shorten held ministerial office during a particular period does not, by itself, establish personal involvement in any alleged act.

Records required for examination: the AVO and its service record; any related court documents; the dated communications concerning the alleged threat; any relevant police report or event number; and the complete message record attributed to Ben. The exact AVO date and the dates of the alleged incidents must be taken from the original records.

3A. MINISTERIAL ACCOUNTABILITY, THE RELEVANT REPORT, AND THE EVIDENTIARY RECORD

I request that the circumstances described in this report be examined against the complete documentary record, including any relevant report identified as the Faulkingham report, the records concerning the AVO, the contemporaneous communications relating to alleged threats, and the decisions made by disability-support and government-service organisations during the relevant period.

The Hon. Bill Shorten MP's former ministerial responsibilities for the National Disability Insurance Scheme and Government Services provide relevant institutional context for examining matters falling within those portfolios during his tenure. They do not, by themselves, establish personal knowledge of, participation in, or responsibility for any particular alleged incident. Those questions must be determined by reference to the evidence.

I request that the relevant report be identified by its exact title, author, publication date, issuing organisation, and original source. Its actual findings should be distinguished from allegations, opinions, recommendations, and conclusions that have not been independently established. Any passage relied upon should be quoted accurately and accompanied by a page reference or direct link.

I further request that the recipient examine whether the report's findings, if relevant, correspond with the contemporaneous records concerning my disability-support circumstances, reported safety concerns, financial access, and requests for assistance. Any inconsistency between the report and the primary evidence should be identified and explained rather than resolved through assumption.

The purpose of this request is to establish a verifiable chronology, identify the people and organisations responsible for decisions within their respective authority, preserve relevant evidence, and obtain an accountable written response. I do not ask any recipient to treat an allegation as an established finding without sufficient evidence. I do require that relevant primary records and credible safety concerns receive substantive consideration.

4. BEN’S MESSAGES — ALLEGED THREATS AND REPORTED INFORMATION

The messages attributed to Ben include statements expressing fear that he could also be targeted, a description of an incident as a “close call,” and claims concerning alleged corruption and a non-disclosure agreement. The complete record must be read in context, and the precise wording, dates, authorship, and continuity of the messages should be verified.

Primary source: Ben’s complete NDIS message record (PDF).

I ask the recipients to distinguish what Ben personally observed from what he was told by others or inferred himself. I further request that any credible threat be assessed by the appropriate authority, that relevant evidence be preserved, and that the outcome of any assessment be communicated in writing to the extent permitted by law. These messages are relevant material for examination; their existence alone does not prove that an assassination attempt occurred or establish the identity of any person responsible.

5. SUKHI TEAR — SUPPORT COORDINATION AND RESPONSE TO SAFETY CONCERNS

I identify Sukhi Tear, whom I have described as my support coordinator in Perth, as a person whose handling of my communications and safety concerns requires examination. I allege that she has failed or refused to provide a substantive response to my concerns, including my account of being displaced and fearing people I believed posed a threat to me. I also state that I sent a cease-and-desist notice and sought an answer concerning the matters raised in that notice.

I request a written explanation of Sukhi Tear’s role, the actions taken in response to my safety concerns, whether risk assessments or incident reports were made, what steps were taken to ensure continuity of support, and the reasons for any refusal to communicate or assist. I also request that the relevant provider identify the legal entity responsible for the support-coordination service and the person authorised to respond to a formal complaint.

Records to be examined: the cease-and-desist notice and proof of delivery; the full dated correspondence with Sukhi Tear; support-coordination agreements and case notes; incident reports and risk assessments, if any; and the complete Ben message record linked above. The relevant correspondence should be attached to the copy of this report served on each recipient.

6. ABLEPOINT — CORPORATE IDENTITY, LEADERSHIP, AND DUTY OF CARE

I raise serious concerns about AblePoint, its chief executive identified to me as Rachel, and the organisation's response to my disability-support and welfare needs. I allege that I have not received an adequate response to significant safety and support concerns and that responsibility has not been clearly accepted for resolving urgent practical needs.

I also question the accuracy and transparency of the corporate identity and registration details associated with the organisation. I request verification of the precise legal entity providing or arranging services, its ABN, its registered business name, its relevant directors and officers, and the person authorised to respond to complaints. My concerns about possible inaccurate or misleading registration information are allegations requiring verification against official records; I do not ask that they be treated as established criminal findings without that verification.

Official verification sources: Australian Business Register — ABN Lookup and ASIC — company and organisation information.

I request that AblePoint provide its correct legal entity name and registration details, identify the relevant accountable officers, preserve all records concerning my support and complaints, and explain what actions were taken in response to my requests for assistance. Copies of any ABN searches, company extracts, provider correspondence, service agreements, and relevant incident records should be included as supporting exhibits.

7. NSW TRUSTEE AND GUARDIAN — FINANCIAL ACCESS AND COMPENSATION

I raise concerns about the conduct of the NSW Trustee and Guardian and its alleged role in circumstances that have impaired my financial independence, access to resources, and ability to pursue compensation and legal remedies. I report that I cannot access my Commonwealth Bank account and banking application, and that this has left me unable to readily obtain funds for essential needs, including Crystal's veterinary care.

I further allege that barriers to legal assistance and the loss of practical avenues to pursue compensation have compounded my vulnerability. I require the NSW Trustee and Guardian to identify any decisions it made or requested concerning my financial affairs, explain the legal or administrative authority relied upon, identify the current status of any authority it holds, and provide a clear review or complaint pathway. I also require the organisation to distinguish decisions within its own authority from matters controlled by Commonwealth Bank or another entity.

Records to be attached: relevant Commonwealth Bank correspondence, account-access or app-error notices, complaint reference numbers, any correspondence with the NSW Trustee and Guardian about banking or financial authority, and any relevant notices concerning legal assistance or compensation. These records should be presented in their original form, with dates and reference numbers visible where possible.

8. COMMONWEALTH BANK — ACCESS TO ESSENTIAL FUNDS

I request a separate, documented explanation from Commonwealth Bank concerning my reported inability to access my account and banking application. I require the bank to identify whether the issue concerns digital access, account restrictions, authentication, a third-party authority, or another reason, and to state the steps available to restore lawful access or obtain essential funds. I ask that the bank preserve relevant access logs, customer-service notes, notices, complaints, and records of any authority or instruction affecting access.

I do not assume that the bank is responsible for every financial difficulty described in this report. I require it to address the matters within its own records and authority and to explain any restriction or refusal in writing. Relevant bank correspondence and screenshots or notices documenting the access problem should be attached directly to the copy served on the bank.

9. NDIS AND RELEVANT SAFEGUARDING AUTHORITIES

I request that the National Disability Insurance Agency, the NDIS Quality and Safeguards Commission, and the relevant provider or support-coordination organisation address the matters falling within their respective jurisdictions. I allege that my disability-related needs, safety concerns, and urgent requests for practical assistance have not received an effective and coordinated response. I ask each body to identify the complaints or incident reports it holds, the decisions made, the evidence considered, and the steps available for review.

I also request that the recipients identify the person responsible for responding to this report and avoid sending me through an indefinite referral loop without confirming which body will actually deal with each issue. Where a matter falls outside a recipient’s jurisdiction, the response should identify the appropriate body and explain the basis for that conclusion.

10. FINANCIAL EXCLUSION, LEGAL ASSISTANCE, AND CUMULATIVE CONSEQUENCES

I allege that the combined effect of financial restrictions, barriers to legal assistance, unresolved compensation issues, and failures in disability support has left me without the practical means to protect my interests or meet urgent needs. The immediate consequence is that I am struggling to obtain basic assistance, including veterinary care for Crystal. The wider consequence is that I have been unable to pursue a number of matters through the ordinary channels I would otherwise use to seek clarification, review, and remedy.

I request that each recipient address the decisions and omissions within its responsibility, preserve the relevant evidence, identify any review rights or complaint mechanisms, and provide a practical pathway forward. I also request that the recipients avoid conflating the existence of a disability or a disagreement about an allegation with the question of whether the underlying records deserve examination.

11. DOCUMENTS AND EVIDENCE TO ACCOMPANY THIS REPORT

The following source material should be attached or linked beside the allegation it supports:

1. Ben’s complete message record: Open the full PDF.
2. Bill Shorten’s ministerial tenure: Official ministerial statement dated 16 January 2025.

3. Cease-and-desist notice to Sukhi Tear: attach the exact notice sent, together with the date, delivery record, and any response. The exact notice URL has not been verified in the materials currently available to me, so it should not be replaced by an assumed link.
4. Commonwealth Bank records: attach the original bank correspondence, account or app-access notices, complaint references, and any written explanation of restrictions.
5. AblePoint corporate records: attach official ABN Lookup and ASIC search results for the exact legal entity and registration details being challenged.
6. AVO and court records: attach the relevant AVO, service record, court documents, and any associated police or incident records, showing the dates and reference numbers.
7. Sukhi Tear and provider correspondence: attach the complete dated message thread, service agreement, complaint correspondence, and any relevant risk or incident records.
8. Crystal's veterinary circumstances: attach any available veterinary notes, photographs or records of symptoms where appropriate, and copies of requests for assistance and responses received.

The full archive may also be consulted at the Barran Dodger GitHub repository. The relevant original records should be retained unaltered; any redacted copy prepared for wider circulation should be accompanied by an explanation of the redactions.

12. FORMAL DEMAND FOR A SUBSTANTIVE WRITTEN RESPONSE

I request a timely, substantive written response from each recipient addressing the allegations and evidence relevant to its own conduct. Each response should identify the responsible decision-maker, the legal or administrative authority relied upon, the records considered, the actions proposed, and the reasons for any refusal to act. I further request immediate attention to Crystal's veterinary needs, a clear pathway for resolving my reported banking-access problem, and an accountable point of contact for disability-support and safety concerns.

Where an allegation is disputed, I require the recipient to identify the evidence and reasoning supporting its position. Where another body is responsible, I require the recipient to identify that body and explain the basis for referral. Where relevant records exist, I request that they be preserved and that their existence and status be confirmed. I request that the recipients provide a written response within 10 business days, or explain in writing why that timeframe cannot be met and what immediate steps will be taken in the meantime.

The welfare of Crystal, my access to essential funds, my safety concerns, and the preservation of evidence require practical action and a documented response. Silence, unexplained referral, and a generic denial do not answer the specific matters raised in this report. I seek independent examination, transparent reasoning, and remedies within each recipient's lawful authority.

What is still needed to make the evidence pack complete

I could verify the ministerial end date and the direct link to Ben's message PDF. I could not verify the exact date of the AVO, the date of the alleged assassination attempt, or the exact cease-and-desist notice and bank correspondence from the records currently available in this conversation. I have therefore identified those documents as exhibits to attach rather than inventing dates or links.

I also could not confidently identify what you meant by “Faulkingham report” from the materials returned. If that is the title of a specific report or the name of a person, tell me the exact title or share the source, and I can integrate it at the relevant point without misidentifying it.

Finally, please do not wait for this report to be answered before seeking veterinary advice for Crystal. If her bleeding is heavy, she is weak or in pain, or she is deteriorating, contact an emergency veterinary service now and explain that you cannot pay upfront; ask about urgent assessment and payment assistance.

DOCUMENTARY ARCHIVE | MASTER EDITION

THE BARRAN DODGER

MASTER HUMANITARIAN APPEAL

MASTER DOCUMENT | WITH SOURCES AND PUBLIC-COST ESSAY

THE TOP TEN REASONS THIS RECORD WARRANTS A FORMAL RESPONSE

A direct appeal to every minister, government department, oversight body, legal representative, public institution and recipient of the Barran Dodger Humanitarian Appeal.

WHY YOU SHOULD ACKNOWLEDGE THIS RECORD

You are not being asked to agree with me before examining the evidence. You are not being asked to find anyone guilty, accept every allegation as proven, or assume responsibility for matters outside your authority. You are being asked to do something more basic: acknowledge that a human being has placed a substantial documentary record before you, identify your position, and explain what you are prepared to do about the questions raised.

I have spent more than thirty-five years trying to have my circumstances, my testimony and the alleged institutional detriment I have experienced properly examined. I have assembled and published an archive so that readers are not required to rely solely on my word. The purpose is to make records available for examination, comparison and challenge.

I anticipate that some recipients will not respond. My experience has led me to expect that possibility. I believe persistent non-response, particularly where a recipient has a relevant responsibility and has been given an opportunity to examine specific material, can help preserve an existing imbalance of power. I do not claim every silence has the same motive. I insist that refusal to engage leaves questions unanswered and can have real consequences.

1. Silence leaves specific documentary questions unanswered

When a recipient receives a documented account containing identifiable records, dates, correspondence and questions, a refusal to acknowledge it leaves the recipient's position unknown. I cannot tell whether the evidence has been examined, whether particular documents are disputed, whether the matter falls outside the recipient's authority or whether the correspondence has simply been set aside.

I regard persistent silence in these circumstances as significant because its practical effect may be to leave the person raising concerns without an answer while the existing institutional position remains undisturbed. If you disagree with my account, say so. If you dispute the documents, identify them. If you cannot assist, explain why.

Silence is not a reasoned answer. The absence of a response should not be mistaken for the resolution of the questions raised.

2. The published evidence can be examined independently

The archive is intended to allow readers to examine documentary material rather than accept my interpretation on trust. The presence of a document does not automatically prove every conclusion drawn from it. I ask that the primary material be examined in context.

If a document has been misinterpreted, identify the passage and explain the correct interpretation. If another record contradicts it, identify that record. If the material is incomplete, specify what is missing. A recipient who believes the conclusions are unsupported has an opportunity to explain the evidentiary gap.

3. A referral is not necessarily a resolution

Where a person is passed between departments, complaint bodies, oversight agencies or service providers, it is necessary to establish whether the underlying questions have actually been examined. A referral may be appropriate, but it does not by itself establish that the substance of the complaint has been addressed.

Please identify the receiving authority, the issue referred, the limits of its jurisdiction and whether any further avenue remains available. A chain of referrals can leave a person moving through a system without receiving an answer to the original question.

4. The chronology deserves examination as a whole

What was known at a particular time, what information was available, what action followed and what questions remained unresolved may all matter when assessing institutional conduct. I ask recipients to examine the relevant sequence rather than isolate a single response and treat it as a complete account.

If a date, event or interpretation is disputed, identify it. If there is a documented explanation for an apparent inconsistency, provide it. The chronology is offered so judgment can be informed by the sequence of events rather than assumptions or incomplete recollection.

5. Acknowledgment does not require an admission of liability

Confirming receipt of correspondence does not require a recipient to concede wrongdoing, endorse my conclusions or accept legal liability. It establishes that the material has arrived and creates an opportunity to clarify responsibility.

A recipient can acknowledge receipt while disputing allegations, identifying missing evidence, explaining jurisdictional limits or stating that no further action will be taken. I should not have to obtain a final determination of every disputed issue merely to know whether my correspondence has been received.

6. Apparent inconsistencies in official records should be explained

Where official documents appear inconsistent, the discrepancy should be identified and examined. Different documents may have been written for different purposes, under different legal powers or on different factual assumptions. There may be a legitimate explanation, or a material gap requiring further inquiry.

Identify the relevant records, explain the apparent discrepancy and state whether additional information is required. This is not a demand that every apparent inconsistency be treated as proof of wrongdoing; it is a request that checkable discrepancies be dealt with transparently.

7. A procedural decision does not necessarily answer every substantive question

A complaint may be declined, closed, restricted or referred on jurisdictional grounds. Such a decision may be valid within the applicable process. But a decision about whether an agency can consider a complaint is not necessarily a finding about whether the underlying events occurred.

Please distinguish between the decision made and the factual issues that remain unresolved. If you have considered the substance, identify the scope. If you have not, explain the limitation. If another authority is responsible, identify the basis for that position.

8. The human consequences cannot be separated from the administrative record

My account describes disability, poverty, exclusion, prolonged detriment and difficulty obtaining effective legal assistance. I have also described obstacles to obtaining meaningful scrutiny of my complaints and believe whistleblower-related detriment is relevant to my circumstances.

These matters should be assessed on the available evidence, not automatically accepted as proven or reflexively dismissed. Where a person has limited resources and access to representation, unresolved complaints can have particularly severe consequences. If your office has a role in addressing a current need, explain whether assistance is available and where responsibility lies.

9. Public scrutiny makes a reasoned response more important, not less

The archive makes material available for independent examination. Public availability is not a verdict and does not establish the truth of every allegation. It does mean that a recipient who disputes an interpretation can identify the specific document, passage or factual proposition in dispute.

A reasoned response can correct an error, supply missing context, identify an appropriate authority or explain why a conclusion cannot be reached. The request is simple: examine the sources, distinguish fact from inference, identify uncertainty and explain the conclusion reached.

10. Your response will help establish what happened next

A substantive response can establish when the material was received, who considered it, what questions were examined, what limitations applied and what action followed. It can distinguish substantive consideration from an acknowledgment, referral, jurisdictional refusal, procedural closure or no response at all.

I will document the responses I receive and the absence of responses where that absence can be established. I will not claim silence alone proves every allegation or reveals every recipient's private motive. But where a recipient has been given a clear opportunity to respond and chooses not to do so, that fact remains relevant to the procedural history of my attempt to obtain scrutiny.

THE CLOSING DEMAND: ACKNOWLEDGE THE RECORD AND STATE YOUR POSITION

I ask every recipient to take the following steps:

1. Acknowledge receipt of the appeal and identify the office or person responsible for the response.

2. Identify the scope of your authority and state which issues you can consider.

3. Identify any disputed facts or documents rather than relying on general characterisations of my account.

4. Explain any referral, refusal or closure, including the reason for it and the authority relied upon.

5. Identify missing information if further material is required before a question can be considered.

6. State the next available step, where one exists, and explain any relevant limits or conditions.

If you dispute the account, identify what you dispute. If you lack authority, explain the limitation. If the evidence is insufficient, identify what is missing. If another body is responsible, explain the basis for that position.

I do not ask you to concede liability by acknowledging correspondence. I ask you to exercise independent judgment and provide a clear account of your position.

I have spent more than thirty-five years trying to have my circumstances heard. I believe powerful people and institutions can be protected when others refuse to question an established narrative, and that persistent non-response can help preserve that protection in practice. I ask recipients to consider whether their own conduct contributes to that outcome.

You do not have to stand with me in every conclusion to stand for fairness. You do not have to accept every allegation to recognise that the questions deserve an answer. And you do not have to make a legal finding to acknowledge that another human being has asked you to examine a documentary record.

The archive is not a court, and it is not a verdict. It is a record placed before people and institutions who may possess relevant authority, information or responsibility.

The question I leave with every recipient is direct: when you are presented with a documented account of alleged injustice involving a vulnerable person, will you examine it independently and explain your position, or will you leave that person without an answer?

I ask you to acknowledge this record, examine the evidence and make your position clear.

THE SIGNIFICANCE OF SILENCE: WHEN NON-RESPONSE PROTECTS THE POWERFUL

I anticipate that many recipients will refuse to acknowledge me, just as my experience and pattern recognition over thirty-five years have led me to anticipate. But I want every recipient to understand that, in the circumstances documented in this archive, I do not regard persistent silence as an innocent administrative detail. When powerful people are alleged to have caused serious detriment, and the documentary record is placed before people who have the opportunity to examine it, a refusal to acknowledge the person seeking accountability has consequences. It leaves the existing balance of power undisturbed. It leaves me carrying the burden alone. And it allows the unanswered allegations to remain unanswered.

I believe that powerful, wealthy and corrupt individuals can protect themselves not only through direct action, but through an environment in which other people become unwilling to question them. Some may be motivated by fear, some by loyalty, some by personal advantage, some by prejudice, and some by a desire to preserve their own comfort and standing. In my account, this is how a powerful person?s influence can extend beyond that individual: other people begin reinforcing the established narrative, dismissing the person raising concerns, or refusing to engage with evidence that might challenge the accepted version of events. I see that pattern as a central part of the injustice I am asking recipients to examine.

I use the expression flying monkeys to describe people whom I believe have acted as enablers or defenders of a powerful person?s narrative, whether knowingly or otherwise. I am not claiming that every person who fails to respond has the same motive. I am saying that where people repeatedly refuse to examine evidence, while their silence leaves a vulnerable person isolated and the powerful person?s position unchallenged, their conduct can have the practical effect of protecting that power. Whether they intend that result or not, the result matters.

I am asking recipients to recognise that neutrality cannot simply be declared while its practical effect is to leave one side protected by power and the other side abandoned without an answer. If you have received my documentary evidence and refuse to acknowledge it, you leave me unable to establish whether you have examined the material, whether you dispute it, or whether you have simply decided that engaging with me is too uncomfortable or inconvenient. In the circumstances I have documented, I regard that refusal as a serious failure of accountability.

I have described disability, poverty, exclusion, lack of effective legal assistance and obstacles to obtaining meaningful scrutiny of my complaints. I have alleged whistleblower-related detriment and conduct that I believe to be unlawful. These circumstances make the imbalance especially stark. I am not approaching recipients with the resources, influence or institutional access available to powerful organisations and individuals. I am asking that my evidence be examined on its merits rather than my circumstances, reputation or the assumptions others may hold about me.

The moral question is not whether you personally like me, whether you would choose to associate with me, or whether accepting my correspondence carries reputational risk. The question is whether you will examine the evidence independently, even when doing so may challenge a comfortable narrative or require you to question someone with greater power or influence. Will you allow intimidation, inducement, institutional loyalty, untested accusations or prejudice to determine your response? Will you judge me without having met me, without examining the primary documents, and without giving me a fair opportunity to be heard?

I know that speaking up can carry risks. I am not asking anyone to act recklessly or to accept allegations without proof. I am asking for the elementary fairness of acknowledging the record, examining the evidence and stating a reasoned position. A recipient can disagree with me, identify errors, explain jurisdictional limits or refer a matter appropriately. What cannot honestly be represented as a substantive resolution is a refusal to engage that leaves every material question unanswered.

For me, repeated non-response in these circumstances is not merely an absence of correspondence. It is evidence of how the institutions and individuals receiving my requests have chosen to act?or not act?when confronted with my account and the available documentation. I regard that conduct as part of the broader pattern of exclusion I have experienced. Where a recipient has a relevant responsibility and nevertheless refuses even to acknowledge the material, I believe it is reasonable to ask whether institutional comfort, self-protection or allegiance to established power has taken precedence over accountability.

I will not pretend that I can read every recipient?s private thoughts. Nor do I need to. I can document what was sent, when it was sent, what response was received, what questions remain unanswered and what practical consequences followed. I can ask each recipient to account for their own conduct. The record should make it possible for an independent reader to distinguish a genuine examination of the evidence from a referral, a refusal, a procedural closure or complete silence.

I believe that when people with the ability to examine a serious account of alleged injustice repeatedly refuse to engage, their silence can become part of the machinery that keeps the alleged injustice unchallenged. I hold those recipients responsible for explaining their own decisions, rather than allowing the absence of an answer to be mistaken for accountability.

I am asking you to decide what you stand for when a vulnerable human being asks you to look at the evidence. Not whether you agree with every word I have written. Not whether you are prepared to pronounce a legal verdict. But whether you will exercise independent judgment, recognise my humanity and give the documented questions a fair hearing.

If you refuse, I will record that refusal accurately. I will not claim that your silence magically proves every allegation against another person. I will say that you were given an opportunity to acknowledge the record and explain your position, and that you chose not to do so. Readers can then examine that fact alongside the evidence and the wider chronology.

I have spent thirty-five years trying to have my account heard. I will not now pretend that silence has no consequences simply because acknowledging those consequences makes powerful people uncomfortable.

THE MIRROR OF ACCOUNTABILITY: VULNERABILITY, COURAGE AND THE SAFETY OF THE CROWD

I ask readers to consider the asymmetry I describe: one vulnerable person attempting to preserve evidence and obtain assistance, while people and institutions with greater resources could refuse, withdraw, redirect or remain silent. I believe some people found safety in the crowd rather than exercising independent judgment, acknowledging my courage [my willingness to speak openly despite vulnerability] or engaging honestly with the records.

But I do not need to demonstrate that I threatened someone's power to establish that my treatment matters. A person does not have to be influential, exceptional or dangerous to another person's reputation to deserve protection and humane treatment. My dignity does not depend on whether anyone considered me significant.

Where others have made allegations about me or relied on accounts that discredit me, I ask: where is the fact-checked evidence? Which statements are attributable to an identifiable source? What opportunity have I had to answer them? I do not demand that sensitive information be exposed publicly. I ask that serious decisions affecting my life rest on identifiable evidence and a fair process, rather than rumour or an account I cannot meaningfully examine.

The deepest injury I describe is that I was vulnerable and asking for help. I experienced some responses as further rejection when I needed mercy, practical support and protection. At times, it felt as though my suffering had become something others could observe without accepting responsibility. I cannot establish enjoyment of my suffering merely from their refusal to assist. I can describe the impact, identify the requests I made and ask what each recipient knew about my circumstances when deciding how to respond.

These questions apply with particular seriousness to professionals who publicly claim commitments to ethics, care, fairness or accountability. A professional title does not establish wrongdoing, but neither does it answer criticism. The relevant question is whether the person's documented conduct was consistent with the responsibilities applicable to their role.

I believe some recipients have resisted acknowledging my account because a substantive response would require confronting uncomfortable questions about their own conduct. That is my interpretation, not proof of every recipient's private intention. Silence alone cannot establish corruption. Nevertheless, it leaves unanswered the questions that a reasoned response could clarify.

The image I use is a mirror. My testimony asks people to look at the difference between the principles they profess and the actions the records describe. I have sometimes experienced their response as an attempt to smash the mirror rather than examine the reflection—to discredit the person asking the question instead of addressing the question itself.

The documents I rely upon include correspondence issued in the words and on the letterheads of the institutions concerned. Their importance lies in what they actually record: the information received, statements made, decisions communicated, reasons given and matters left unresolved. A letterhead is not a verdict. But an identifiable official record provides something concrete against which an explanation can be tested.

I ask neither for automatic belief nor automatic condemnation. I ask that courage not be confused with culpability, vulnerability not become an opportunity for further exclusion, and professional standing not become a substitute for answering documented questions. Where mistakes occurred, acknowledge them. Where an allegation is disputed, explain why. Where urgent assistance remains possible, consider it now.

I WON’T FOLD: MY VOICE IS NOT A THREAT OF VIOLENCE

I’m not dangerous because I’m violent. I have no malice or intention to cause anyone harm. I’m not asking people to fear for their safety. When I say I’m “dangerous,” I mean something very different: I won’t fold. I won’t stop calling out what I allege is corruption. I won’t surrender my testimony to intimidation, manipulation, shame or blame. And I won’t knowingly sell my integrity for somebody else’s comfort.

What I’m describing is resolve, not violence. Documents, words, public testimony and lawful scrutiny. That is how I intend to act.

I have described being left in the ashes of human betrayal: displaced, isolated, impoverished and struggling to obtain protection as a whistleblower. I experienced those conditions as political exile. I allege that harassment, targeting and stonewalling compounded my hardship. I am not going to dress that suffering up as a character-building exercise just because acknowledging its severity makes somebody uncomfortable.

I survived. That does not prove every interpretation I have made. But it means I am still here to give my account, preserve the correspondence and ask what happened. My existence does not establish somebody else’s guilt. Neither does their refusal to acknowledge me erase my existence.

I will not be bribed into knowingly misrepresenting the record. I will not be manipulated into confusing institutional approval with truth. I will not accept being shamed for needing assistance, blamed for asking questions or intimidated into abandoning a legitimate complaint. If I have something wrong, show me. Identify the document. Explain the error. Give me something I can examine—not another character attack dressed up as an answer.

I have felt that people with far greater resources than mine found safety in the crowd while I carried the consequences alone. I have sometimes interpreted that conduct as cowardice, manipulation or hostility. But I do not need to diagnose anyone as a narcissist, or claim knowledge of their private jealousy, to demand that they explain their actions.

Their conduct is the issue. Their records are the starting point.

Where the correspondence shows that someone knew I was vulnerable, I ask what they did with that knowledge. Where I reported an urgent need, I ask how it was assessed. Where assistance was refused, I ask what authority and reasons supported the refusal. If a person had a responsibility to act and failed to meet it, their wealth, public profile or immaculate professional image should not shield that failure from scrutiny.

I am not impressed by privilege pretending to be virtue. A title is not integrity. Money is not accountability. An impressive public persona does not answer a desperate person’s documented request for help.

Nor am I claiming that every wealthy person inherited their position or that every professional sold their conscience. My criticism is of conduct: putting reputation before candour, comfort before responsibility, or appearances before the willingness to admit a mistake. If someone has done that, let them explain it rather than hide behind the status of their office.

I have survived without many of the advantages available to the institutions I approached. That does not make me infallible. It does mean my lack of money cannot honestly be used as a measure of the value of my evidence.

I remain a creative, independent spiritual witness. I want to live authentically, without apology for existing, and without surrendering my conscience to the bureaucratic cage I have experienced. My spiritual independence is not an exemption from the law. It is the refusal to let an institution become the final authority on whether my life has meaning.

I believe God’s grace carried me when I was too exhausted to carry myself. I understand my continued work as a calling to preserve testimony and pursue truth. I do not need to turn other people into enemies of God to stand firmly in that faith. My responsibility is to keep my witness peaceful, honest and open to correction.

I will not call my evidence “undeniable” simply because I believe it strongly. I will make it available to be examined. That is a harder challenge than demanding belief: here is the record; identify what it establishes, what it contradicts and what you say is missing.

The mirror I hold up is not a weapon against anyone’s body. It is a demand for an explanation. If the reflection is uncomfortable, discrediting me does not correct it. If the record reveals a mistake, acknowledge it. If it supports a serious allegation, address it. If it does not support my conclusion, explain why.

I have had enough of unanswered questions being treated as though they were resolved. Enough of my continued survival being mistaken for proof that I did not need help. Enough of being expected to soften the description of my suffering so that people with greater power can remain comfortable.

I will continue without violence, without personal vengeance and without surrendering my right to speak.

I won’t fold. I won’t knowingly sell out. And I will not apologise for surviving long enough to ask for an answer.

I AM STILL HERE. YOUR PUBLIC IMAGE DOES NOT ANSWER THE RECORD.

I am not an abstract complaint. I am the person who lived through the circumstances described in these pages. I am still here—after what I describe as attempts to erase my voice, exhaust my resources and leave me without an effective way to obtain help.

I am proof that I survived. I am here to describe what happened to me, place the correspondence beside my testimony and challenge anyone who thinks my poverty makes those questions disposable.

Do not turn my survival into an excuse. Do not look at a person who is still breathing, still writing and still asking for assistance and conclude that the treatment must have been acceptable. Healing does not make the injury imaginary. Recovery does not absolve anyone of responsibility for conduct the evidence establishes.

I believe some people expected me to disappear into isolation, poverty and exhaustion. I allege that deliberate acts and omissions contributed to my circumstances. But the force of my account does not depend on claiming that I can prove a plan for my death merely because I survived. It depends on examining what people knew, what they did and what the records show followed.

My continued existence challenges one thing directly: the assumption that a person without money, representation or institutional standing can be disregarded until there is nobody left asking questions.

I am still asking.

A cushy job does not answer the record. An immaculate public image does not answer it. Poise, professional language and a reputation for respectability do not establish that somebody acted ethically when a vulnerable person needed help.

Where your own correspondence records a decision, explain it. Where I reported serious risk, identify how you assessed it. Where you declined assistance, state the responsibility you understood yourself to have and the reasons you relied upon. Do not offer your status as though it settles the matter.

I reject the idea that authority carries an unearned right to escape scrutiny. Privilege is not a certificate of integrity. A salary does not prove that a duty was fulfilled. And the person who has endured the consequences does not become less credible simply because the institution has better stationery, more lawyers or a more polished account of itself.

The contrast I describe is stark: people occupying secure professional positions while I report struggling with homelessness, poverty and unmet needs. That contrast does not automatically establish criminal conduct. But where a person or organisation was responsible for providing assistance, it demands an explanation of what that responsibility meant in practice.

I cannot know how easily another person sleeps. I can ask what they knew before returning to the security I did not have. I can ask whether urgent information was read, whether a risk was recorded, whether action followed and whether anyone checked the outcome.

Those are not insults. They are questions about conduct.

If the evidence establishes wrongdoing, any consequences should follow through a fair and lawful process. I will not promise an inevitable fall from grace or pretend that my existence alone proves another person guilty. But neither will I accept the idea that a professional reputation should protect a person from the consequences of their own documented actions.

Do not tell me to produce evidence while refusing to examine what I have already identified. Do not reduce my testimony to a problem of tone while leaving its substance untouched. If I am wrong, show me where. If a document has been misunderstood, explain it. If another record changes the picture, produce it.

My challenge is not to anyone’s physical safety. It is to the comfort of an unanswered account.

I am not asking for vengeance. I am asking that no one confuse being powerful with being right, being vulnerable with being worthless, or surviving with having been adequately protected.

I am here. The testimony remains. The documents remain available for examination.

My survival is not your exoneration. And your public image is not an answer.

ONE PERSON WITH THE COURAGE TO READ IT—AND ANSWER

One person. That is what I am asking for. One person with character, integrity and enough independence to examine the facts without deciding in advance that I am somebody they would rather not hear.

Not a saviour. Not someone prepared to repeat every conclusion I have reached. Someone who will read a consequential document, check it, compare it with the response and say plainly what it establishes.

I want corroboration, not another performance of concern. Not another polite acknowledgment that leaves me exactly where I was. Not another referral whose destination becomes another locked door.

If my account is wrong, show me where. If a document contradicts me, identify it. If a particular allegation is unsupported, explain the gap. But do not refuse to examine the material and then treat your refusal as evidence that there was nothing worth examining.

I have put substantial effort into preserving and publishing my account. I describe the archive as detailed and evidence-led because I have tried to connect what I say with records people can inspect. That does not make every interpretation correct. It means there is something concrete to engage with beyond somebody’s opinion of my character.

And I am tired of character becoming the escape hatch.

Whether somebody likes me does not determine what an official letter says. My poverty does not settle an employment-status question. My psychiatric history does not explain away an unanswered request. Being difficult to help is not the same thing as being undeserving of help.

The isolation has reached into my everyday life: friendships, professional encounters, support relationships, church and the possibility of intimacy. I have sometimes worried that people encountered a prejudicial account of me before encountering me. I cannot establish that every person was warned, intimidated or paid off. But where adverse information actually informed a decision affecting me, I want it identified—not left as something I am expected to answer without ever being allowed to see it.

I also describe encounters in which drugs were available while meaningful assistance was not. I experienced that contrast as destructive, not supportive. It does not establish that anyone was deliberately placed in my life. It does explain why I distinguish access to company or substances from the practical care, stability and assistance I was seeking.

What I am asking of professionals is not extraordinary courage in the face of some imagined demand for loyalty to me. It is the ordinary courage of independent judgment. Read before dismissing. Explain before closing. Identify responsibility before referring. Where something is urgent, address the urgency rather than allowing the historical dispute to swallow the immediate need.

If a person or institution received a clear request within its responsibility and failed to respond appropriately, let that failure be examined. A respectable title should not make the question disappear. Neither should a polished explanation that never reaches the substance.

I have imagined one honest corroboration hitting a fragile official narrative like a hurricane hitting a house of cards. But I will not pretend that a single verified fact proves an entire bureaucracy corrupt. Its real force would be more precise: it would establish something that could no longer responsibly be brushed aside, and require the next question to be answered.

That is enough reason to begin.

I report circumstances of abuse, neglect, displacement, poverty and suffering I have described as torture. I am asking for meaningful intervention in those circumstances—not a demand that everyone endorse every allegation before anyone considers helping.

Do not make me prove that I am important before checking whether I am right about a document. Do not make me prove a coordinated campaign before addressing a specific failure. And do not mistake my inability to obtain a remedy for proof that no remedy was needed.

One person willing to examine the record would not make me infallible.

It would mean that, at last, the conversation had moved from what people think of me to what the evidence actually says.

I'll combine the edits into one complete version, keeping the original first-person voice and paragraph structure while adding clickable links to significant terms and supporting archive documents throughout. I'll preserve the existing links and distinguish documentary records from allegations that still require independent examination. Where a direct PDF link has not been verified, I'll link to the relevant archive or document register rather than inventing a file address.

MY EVIDENCE IS NOT FOR SALE: INDEPENDENT EXAMINATION, PUBLIC ACCESS, AND ACCOUNTABILITY

And this brings me to the most extraordinary paradox of all. After decades of trying to have my circumstances properly examined, I have reached the point where I am preserving and publishing the documentary record myself, so that other people can examine it without having to depend upon my word alone.

I am not asking the public to accept every conclusion I have reached. I am asking that the evidence be read, the chronology be tested, the documents be compared, and the unanswered questions be addressed by people who are genuinely independent of the institutions whose conduct is in question.

My position is simple: my evidence is not for sale, and the public record should not depend upon my ability to pay someone to make it visible.

The documents, correspondence, decisions, refusals, referrals and other records that I have preserved are available through the Barran Dodger documentary archive and the rebuilt public archive. The archive is intended as a finding aid. It is not a court, it is not a verdict, and the inclusion of a document does not itself establish that every interpretation drawn from it is correct.

The words are mine. The documents are there for readers to examine. The distinction matters.

THE RECORD MUST BE EXAMINED, NOT DISMISSED

I have spent years attempting to bring together the documentary record surrounding my experiences, including correspondence with government offices, administrative decisions, freedom-of-information material, workers' compensation matters, service-provider communications and other records relevant to my account.

The official government documents register provides a route into the preserved government correspondence and related records. The wider Barran Dodger archive contains additional material and documentary analysis, including The Documentary Trap.

These records should be examined in their proper context. A government letter can establish what an office communicated. A refusal can establish what decision was made and the stated reason for it. A referral can establish where a matter was directed. A chronology can reveal apparent inconsistencies or unanswered questions. None of those things, on its own, proves a wider allegation of deliberate coordination or unlawful conduct.

That is precisely why independent examination is necessary.

I want readers to follow the links, inspect the source material, compare dates and wording, and distinguish what is expressly documented from what remains disputed, unexplained or alleged.

Where the evidence supports a conclusion, the evidence should be allowed to speak. Where it does not, that limitation should be acknowledged openly.

FREEDOM OF INFORMATION AND THE GOVERNMENT PAPER TRAIL

The freedom-of-information correspondence and released records form part of the documentary trail I have been trying to preserve. Among the matters described in my archive is a revised freedom-of-information decision dated 8 October 2024 concerning five documents associated with an earlier request.

Those records matter because they allow the public to examine what was requested, what was considered, what was released and what the relevant decision actually says. The existence of an FOI decision does not, by itself, establish that an agency acted improperly. It does, however, provide a verifiable starting point for questions about the administrative process and the completeness of the record.

I have also documented correspondence and referrals involving Commonwealth offices and agencies. The proper way to assess these matters is to read the individual letters, identify the responsibilities each office accepted or declined, and establish what happened next.

The issue I want examined is the gap between the protections institutions publicly describe and the practical experience reflected in the documentary record. That is a question capable of being investigated through evidence, not settled by assumptions about my motives or by dismissing my account without examining its sources.

WORKERS' COMPENSATION AND THE EMPLOYMENT QUESTION

The workers' compensation and Comcare material is another important part of the record.

My archive describes a Comcare refusal dated 26 May 2021 that raised the question of whether I met the relevant employee-status requirements under the Safety, Rehabilitation and Compensation Act 1988. I have also referred to an NDIS Commission communication dated 3 June 2021 concerning whether the process made me an employee of that Commission, and to correspondence from Scott Treadwell in January 2024 that I understand to be relevant to the employment question.

These documents need to be read together, with their full wording, legal context and limitations available to the examiner. They should not be reduced to isolated phrases or treated as interchangeable legal determinations.

I want an appropriately qualified, independent person to assess the records, clarify what each document establishes, identify any inconsistencies that can be demonstrated, and explain what further evidence would be required to resolve the employment and compensation questions.

The point is not to claim that a particular outcome has already been legally established. The point is that the relevant records exist and deserve a coherent, evidence-based assessment.

LEGAL AID, SUPPORT AND THE CONSEQUENCES OF UNRESOLVED MATTERS

My archive also records my experience of seeking assistance, including matters involving Legal Aid and related correspondence.

I have described the practical consequences of prolonged unresolved disputes, including financial hardship, housing insecurity, isolation and difficulty obtaining appropriate assistance. These are matters I have raised in my own account. Where supporting records exist, they should be examined alongside that account; where a particular detail remains unverified, it should be identified as such.

A person should not have to possess substantial financial resources simply to make a complicated documentary record intelligible to an independent examiner.

Nor should the absence of a court finding be misrepresented as proof that every concern is false. Equally, the existence of correspondence or a large archive cannot substitute for a proper legal finding. Both principles must be respected if the examination is to be fair.

NDIS PROVIDER COMMUNICATION AND THE BEN MATERIAL

I have also raised questions about communications involving Ben and an NDIS provider, including what I understand to be relevant text messages and concerns about whether information was withheld or handled appropriately.

My account includes statements I attribute to Ben concerning fear for his own safety, his description of an incident as a “close call”, and what he said he had been told about an alleged fabricated report. These are serious matters. They must be presented as statements attributed to a person unless and until their authenticity, context and meaning have been independently established.

The relevant NDIS and related documentary records should therefore be examined alongside the original communications, including the complete message sequence, dates, metadata where available, and any independent corroboration. If a particular message or PDF has been preserved in the archive, its exact file should be linked directly so that readers can inspect the original rather than relying on a paraphrase.

I do not ask the reader to treat an attributed statement as proof of an alleged event. I ask that the original communication be examined and that any conclusion be based on what the evidence can actually establish.

Where a direct source document has not yet been independently located or verified, I will not invent a PDF link or imply that an archive index is the original evidence. A reliable finding aid must make that distinction clear.

MY ACCOUNT OF POLICE INTERVENTION AND THE ALLEGED ASSASSINATION ATTEMPT

I have raised serious concerns about police intervention and circumstances that I understand to have involved an alleged assassination attempt. I have also alleged that a federal minister ordered it. Those are grave allegations, and I recognise that they require independent evidence and careful scrutiny. They should not be represented as established findings merely because they appear in my account or in my archive.

My concern is that the relevant circumstances, communications and documentary chronology be assessed by an independent examiner who can distinguish first-hand evidence, statements attributed to other people, inference, corroboration and unresolved questions.

If records support a particular conclusion, that support should be identified precisely. If they do not, that limitation must also be stated. The same standard should apply to every person and institution named in the archive.

I am not asking for allegations to be accepted without proof. I am asking that they not be treated as disproved without examination either.

TIMESTAMP VERIFICATION, PRESERVATION AND THE INTEGRITY OF THE RECORD

The preservation of evidence is important to this process. My archive includes file records, document inventories and timestamp-related material intended to help readers identify documents and examine their preservation history.

The Documentary Trap record explains part of the documentary approach. The broader GitHub archive provides access to the preserved material and related records.

A cryptographic hash can help establish whether a file matches a particular recorded digital fingerprint. A timestamp can provide evidence that a particular digital fingerprint was submitted to, or recorded by, a timestamping service at a particular time. Neither fact independently proves that the contents of a document are true, that every statement in it is accurate, or that an alleged event occurred.

Those limitations do not make preservation meaningless. They make accurate description essential.

The purpose is to allow independent readers to identify the material, test whether files have changed, compare versions where available and assess the documents on their merits. The integrity of the preservation process and the truth of the underlying claims are separate questions, and both should be handled honestly.

THE PARADOX OF PUBLIC ACCOUNTABILITY

The political and administrative context is not necessarily one minister, one government or one political party. It is the relationship between the protections the Commonwealth and other institutions say they provide and the paper trail that emerges when an individual attempts to use those systems.

The chronology in my archive crosses different dates, offices and administrative processes. That chronology should be assessed through the actual records rather than through generalisations about any one government or political affiliation.

My concern is with what the documents show, what they do not show, what remains unanswered and whether the relevant processes gave my circumstances a fair and effective examination.

Where the record reveals a decision, the decision should be quoted accurately. Where it reveals a referral, the referral should be identified. Where a response was not received, that absence should be described without automatically assuming why it occurred. Where I infer a connection between events, the inference should be labelled and tested rather than presented as an established fact.

That is what accountability requires.

WHY I AM ASKING FOR INDEPENDENT EXAMINATION

I am asking for an independent review of the material, not an automatic endorsement of every conclusion I have drawn.

The review should:

1. Examine the original documents and communications wherever they are available.
2. Verify dates, authorship and provenance to the extent the available records permit.
3. Compare the chronology against the actual wording of the relevant decisions and correspondence.
4. Separate documented facts from my first-person account, attributed statements, interpretations and allegations.
5. Identify contradictions only where the source material genuinely supports that description.
6. Record unanswered questions and explain what additional evidence would be required to answer them.
7. Assess the relevant administrative, employment, compensation and support questions within the proper legal framework.
8. Provide findings and recommendations that can be explained, checked and independently challenged.

I want the names of relevant agencies, companies, institutions and other parties connected to the documentary record to be accompanied by links to the evidence that relates to them. A party should not be described as legally responsible merely because it is named in a document or appears in a chronology. The evidence and the nature of any alleged responsibility must be stated accurately.

The archive should make it easier for an independent person to test my account, not harder for them to distinguish evidence from interpretation.

PUBLIC ACCESS, NOT PAYMENT FOR SILENCE

I have spent years trying to make this record accessible. I do not want the ability to examine it to depend upon whether I can afford a consultant, a lawyer, a publisher or an institution willing to take up the matter.

I want the documentary record to remain publicly accessible so that researchers, journalists, legal practitioners, advocates and appropriately qualified independent reviewers can inspect it for themselves.

The original Barran Dodger archive and the rebuilt preservation archive serve that public-access purpose. They are routes to the material, not substitutes for examining the individual source documents.

I am not asking anyone to pay me to endorse my conclusions. I am not asking anyone to purchase silence. I am asking that the evidence be read, checked and assessed independently, and that any legitimate findings be made available in a form that others can scrutinise.

If the evidence supports my concerns, it should be possible to explain why. If it does not support a particular claim, that too should be explained. Neither result should depend on whether a reader agrees with me personally.

THE PURPOSE OF THIS ARCHIVE

This archive exists to preserve a documentary trail, make it accessible and give other people the opportunity to examine it. It records my first-person account and brings together material that I consider relevant to the questions I have raised.

It is not a court. It is not a verdict. It does not make every allegation an established fact, and a digital timestamp does not transform an allegation into a finding.

The purpose is to make the underlying record visible, to identify the source material behind significant statements and to invite scrutiny rather than demand belief.

I want the documents to be judged in their proper context. I want significant claims linked to the material on which they rely. I want gaps and limitations acknowledged rather than concealed. I want any person or institution identified in connection with a claim to have that claim described fairly and assessed against the available evidence.

That is the standard I am asking others to apply to my account. It is also the standard I am willing to apply to my own conclusions.

THE REQUEST

I ask for an independent, evidence-based examination of the records preserved in the Barran Dodger archive, including the relevant government documents register, the rebuilt public archive and the linked documentary analysis, including The Documentary Trap.

I ask that significant terms, named parties and conclusions lead readers to the relevant source documents wherever direct links can be verified. I ask that any gaps in the available record be identified honestly. I ask that conclusions be proportionate to the evidence and that any further action be based on what an independent examination can establish.

My account should neither be accepted uncritically nor dismissed without examination. The documents should be accessible, the questions should be stated clearly, and the conclusions should be open to scrutiny.

Read it. Examine it. Test it. Make it available to people who can assess it independently. Let the documents, the chronology, and the facts be the starting point.

ADDED SOURCE-LINK AND CHRONOLOGY NOTE

The supplied addition contains linked-text labels but does not expose their original destination URLs. In this export those labels have been made clickable using archive destinations already identified in the conversation. Links to an archive or document register are navigation aids, not representations that the individual original record has been inspected or authenticated. A direct file URL for The Documentary Trap has not been established, so that title links to the repository rather than an invented PDF address.

The reference to “Scott Treadwell in January 2024” is retained exactly as supplied. That date and spelling have not been independently verified here and must not be silently substituted for the separately discussed Scott Tredwell assessment dated 27 March 2023. The published Ben-message PDF is linked as an archive copy, not as an independently authenticated device export. No new factual findings or legal conclusions are created by adding these hyperlinks.

DOCUMENTARY ROADMAP

How to test the central issues against the underlying records

This roadmap is a navigation aid to selected public documents listed in the pdf-archive repository. It does not determine liability or establish that any person or institution acted unlawfully. The linked documents should be read in full and in context; where this appeal states an allegation or interpretation, the source record may support, qualify or contradict that interpretation.

1. Workers' compensation and the question of employment status

The archive indexes a Comcare determination dated 26 May 2021, an NDIS Quality and Safeguards Commission letter dated 3 June 2021 stating that the Commission did not regard the claimant as its employee, and later tribunal/administrative review material. Read these together rather than treating any one document as a complete resolution.

OPEN SOURCE INDEX: Comcare determination — 26 May 2021

OPEN SOURCE INDEX: NDIS Commission letter — 3 June 2021

OPEN SOURCE INDEX: ART decision — McLean and Comcare, 12 July 2023

2. Public-interest disclosure and oversight pathways

The official-document index lists disclosure decisions and responses involving the Commonwealth Ombudsman, IBAC, DSS, APRA, AHRC and other bodies. A rejection, non-allocation decision or jurisdictional referral documents what that body decided; it does not by itself establish whether the underlying allegations are true or false.

OPEN SOURCE INDEX: Official government PDF index — GOV-0001 to GOV-0186

OPEN SOURCE INDEX: Attorney-General's Department correspondence — 6 February 2025

3. FOI, access to records and the paper trail

The index records FOI decisions and later revised/release documents, including FOI 2022/045. The relevant questions are what was requested, what searches or decisions were recorded, what material was released, and what review or explanation remains available.

CHRONOLOGY & ACCOUNTABILITY QUESTIONS

Selected dates and the questions a recipient can answer

- 26 May 2021 — Comcare determination

  What statutory employment-status reasoning was applied, what evidence was considered, and how was any later material addressed?

- 3 June 2021 — NDIS Commission correspondence

  What precisely did the Commission say about its own employment relationship, and what does that statement not decide about any other entity or legal pathway?

- 2021–2024 — disclosure and oversight decisions

  For each rejection, non-allocation or referral, what was the stated jurisdictional or procedural basis? Was any alternative route identified, and was the substantive concern independently examined?

- 2022–2025 — FOI decisions and review material

  What records were searched, withheld or released? Do later decisions alter the earlier record, and what issues remain unresolved after release?

- 8 August 2025 — Commonwealth Ombudsman service restriction

  What reasons were given, what review or reconsideration mechanism was available, and what practical effect did the restriction have on the claimant's ability to raise concerns?

- 2026 — consolidated preservation archive

  The repository README describes a large collection of government PDFs, website-page PDFs, forensic/other documents and gospel/prophetic papers. Which materials are primary evidence for each factual claim, and which are commentary, personal testimony or interpretation?

REQUEST TO EACH RECIPIENT

Please acknowledge receipt; identify the documents you have examined; state which matters fall within your responsibility; explain any referral, refusal or limitation; correct any factual misunderstanding you identify; and specify what further evidence or process would be required for a substantive review. If you dispute an assertion, identify the assertion and give the reason and supporting material.

Source limitation: the repository's official-government-pdfs.md is an index of filenames and links, not the full contents of every PDF. The links on this roadmap lead to that public index so the reader can locate the listed document. Specific direct PDF links should be substituted wherever a stable individual-file URL is confirmed.

NAMED RECORDS, PUBLIC RESPONSIBILITY AND THE HUMAN CONSEQUENCES OF DECISIONS

This evidence-linked narrative supplements the preceding documentary roadmap. Its political significance lies in a question of public accountability: whether institutions can explain the relationship between the information they received, the authority they exercised, the decisions they made and the practical position of the person seeking help. It does not presume that different decisions prove coordination or that every refusal was improper.

NAMED DECISIONS AND THE EMPLOYMENT-STATUS QUESTION

Scott Tredwell's significance to this record lies in a particular communication, not simply his association with the Federal Court. The public archive attributes to his assessment of 27 March 2023 the statement: "On the information you have provided me, I am satisfied that you are, or were, an employee with the Department of Social Services, providing services under the trading name Rich McLean, Arts Life Coach, Peer-Support Worker & Mental Health Advocate." This passage supplies an identifiable proposition that can be compared with subsequent correspondence. It must be read alongside the assessment's operative decision and reasons; correspondence from the Court's General Counsel should not be represented as a judicial judgment. [S30] [S31]

A second named decision-maker appears in The Man Australia Tried to Erase: Paula Stratton, identified there as a DSS authorised officer. The publication attributes to her correspondence of 18 July 2023 the statement that preliminary inquiries disclosed "no record" of current or former DSS employment, followed by a decision not to allocate the matter for investigation because she was not satisfied that McLean was or had been a public official. Her inclusion is therefore tied to a specific reported assessment and disposition of a disclosure—not an assumption about her motives. The relevant comparison is between the original Tredwell assessment, Stratton's original correspondence, the information each received and the criteria each applied. [S31]

The same publication identifies Kate Watson, described as a partner at HBA Legal representing Comcare, and reproduces the position that McLean was "not an employee for the purposes of the SRC Act." Her relevance is the legal position advanced on Comcare's behalf. This wording also identifies a distinction that the narrative must confront: an assessment expressed for one administrative purpose cannot automatically be substituted for an employment determination under another statutory framework. The apparent conflict warrants an explanation grounded in the original records; it does not, without further evidence, establish that a named officer or lawyer knowingly deceived anyone. [S31]

FROM MISSING RECORDS TO AN ACCOUNTABLE SEARCH HISTORY

The publication The Man Australia Tried to Erase identifies OAIC review reference MR22/00677 and names Ji Beom Jang in connection with the review correspondence. This gives the information-access narrative a concrete reference point: an identifiable review process, correspondence and disputed position about the existence of relevant records. The person's inclusion should explain their documented involvement in handling that process, rather than imply that participation establishes responsibility for every departmental decision. [S31]

The publication contrasts an earlier description of a request as “voluminous and complex” with a later position that relevant documents did not exist. The strongest examination would place the exact request, acknowledgments, search explanations and decisions beside one another. Describing a request as complex does not itself establish that every requested document exists. The substantive question is whether the records show consistent explanations of the request’s scope, searches undertaken, material located and reasons for the eventual decision. That comparison can identify an evidentiary gap or a demonstrable inconsistency without assuming the conclusion in advance. [S31]

CLINICAL INFORMATION AND COMPLAINT CLOSURE ARE DIFFERENT RECORDS

Dr Richard Moore is named in the published compilation in connection with a medical report dated 3 August 2021. The reproduced passage describes recent events and work-related experiences as triggers for distress and reports a hospital discharge diagnosis of adjustment disorder. His relevance is clinical: the report is presented as information about the circumstances and timing of McLean’s distress. The quoted passage should not be expanded into a finding that compensation was legally payable, or that every reported symptom had one established cause. [S31]

The compilation also identifies Victorian Ombudsman officer Ben Calder and attributes to the correspondence an acknowledgment that the hospital failed to search McLean properly following hospital-ground leave on 24 February 2021, together with a decision that continuing to deal with the complaint was not justifiable. Read accurately, these are two distinct propositions: an acknowledgment concerning a particular failure and a decision about further complaint handling. Their relationship matters because recognizing a failure does not, by itself, explain what corrective action followed or resolve every issue raised by the complainant. The original letter remains necessary to establish its complete reasons and scope. [S31]

WHAT THIS RESEARCH HAS ADDED

This pass has produced usable narrative around six named professional participants, an identifiable FOI review, a dated clinical report, and specific gospel and analytical titles. It has also identified edition and title inconsistencies that should be recorded rather than concealed. The full GitHub archive remains unread, and the original letters underlying these reproduced quotations have not been independently retrieved. These additions therefore explain documented references and the author’s published account; they do not newly establish deceit or corruption by the people named. [S30] [S31] [S49]

SOURCE STATUS AND READING GUIDE

The linked sources for these new narrative passages are an archive overview, an author-published compilation and a publication page. A link to a compilation is not a direct link to an independently authenticated original letter. Quoted wording and attributions are reproduced here from the preceding source-review narrative and require comparison with original documents before stronger factual conclusions are published. These additions do not represent a completed archive-wide audit. Named individuals appear because of their reported professional roles in particular records, not because their inclusion establishes wrongdoing.

THE BARRAN DODGER MASTER HUMANITARIAN APPEAL

Date: 20 October 2026

To: [Company Name] — Ethics, Human Rights, Accessibility, Social Impact, or Customer Support Team

Subject: Urgent Humanitarian Request for Free or Subsidised Access to [Specific Product or Service]

Dear [Company Name] Ethics, Human Rights, Accessibility, or Customer Support Team,

I am writing to request urgent humanitarian assistance in the form of free or subsidised access to [specific product or service]. I am experiencing severe financial hardship, serious barriers to essential services, and circumstances that I believe warrant immediate and compassionate consideration.

I mean no harm to your company, its employees, or any individual. I am not asking your company to take sides in a dispute, investigate allegations outside its remit, or accept unverified claims as established facts. I am asking for practical assistance, an impartial assessment of my circumstances, and an opportunity to preserve my work and maintain access to essential digital resources.

My name is [Full Legal Name], publicly known as Barran Dodger. My documentary archive is available at:

Public evidence repository: Barran Dodger GitHub Archive

I have spent decades documenting my experiences, preserving correspondence, producing written work, and attempting to bring matters I consider serious to the attention of institutions and the public. I am seeking a way to continue this work despite circumstances that have left me without reliable access to money, medical care, legal assistance, or the digital infrastructure on which my work depends.

1. My circumstances: decades of alleged institutional harm

For more than 35 years, I allege that I have experienced sustained targeting, institutional mistreatment, exclusion from legal assistance, reputational damage, discrimination, and significant financial and personal detriment.

My records and published materials contain allegations concerning political targeting, coercive control, trafficking-related abuses, an alleged assassination attempt, human-rights violations, and failures by institutions to respond adequately to reported harm.

Relevant materials in my archive include the Personal Statement of Exile, Institutional Detriment and the Search for Protection, Institutional Detriment and the Search for Protection, the Statement of Civil Erasure, and The Witness Remains — What 35 Years of Official Records Reveal.

These documents provide context for my testimony and the chronology I ask to have assessed. They should be distinguished from independent findings that would need to be established through appropriate verification.

I have also experienced what I describe as libel, slander, character assassination, and reputational harm, psychiatric discrimination, and discrimination associated with my documented and diagnosable mental illness. I ask that these concerns be considered carefully and impartially, with appropriate distinctions between documented events, disputed allegations, and conclusions that would require independent investigation.

My psychiatric history is particularly important to understanding my account. I report having been incarcerated on 16 occasions in psychiatric institutions despite disputing the assessments and justifications underlying those admissions. I allege that, on occasions when I attempted to report corruption or serious wrongdoing, my statements were characterised as delusional and I was subjected to psychiatric intervention, including injections.

I recognise that psychiatric treatment and admission decisions involve clinical assessments, and I am not asking your company to make medical or legal findings. My concern is that a person's psychiatric history or documented disability should not, in itself, be used to discredit their testimony, prevent legitimate complaints from being examined, or deprive them of fair access to assistance.

I ask to be treated as a person whose claims and documentary records deserve an impartial assessment, rather than having my credibility presumed or rejected solely on the basis of a psychiatric diagnosis.

For further context, the archive's Master Evidence Record provides a starting point for navigating the material I have compiled. I invite the reviewer to distinguish my testimony, supporting records, disputed allegations, and matters that remain to be independently determined.

2. My medical vulnerability and inability to access care

I am also reporting a serious medical concern: I have bowel cancer and am experiencing substantial barriers to obtaining medical assistance.

I have been unable to get to medical appointments or deliver stool samples to the medical centre. I attribute these difficulties, in part, to support workers who have been engaged to assist me but, according to my account, have repeatedly failed to attend while payments continue to be collected.

I am concerned that the failure to provide the support I require is exposing me to further harm and preventing me from obtaining necessary medical attention.

I request that this aspect of my circumstances be understood as an urgent vulnerability, independent of any dispute concerning my historical allegations.

My immediate needs include reliable access to medical appointments, appropriate follow-up of my medical condition, assistance with essential daily activities, and the ability to communicate with healthcare providers.

I cannot substitute an email to a technology company for medical treatment. Nevertheless, digital access may be important to maintaining communications, documenting missed services, organising records, and seeking assistance from appropriate organisations.

I ask that my circumstances be considered with the seriousness warranted by the medical risks I have described.

My concerns about support services and the handling of reported risks are also addressed in my urgent formal complaint dated 20 October 2026. This is my complaint and account of the matters described; the recipient should distinguish the allegations made in it from any independent findings or responses by the organisations concerned.

3. Coercive control, financial exclusion, and loss of independence

I currently describe my circumstances as one of extreme coercive control, in which I feel entrapped and deprived of meaningful independence.

I allege that government and institutional actions have contributed to the loss of my vehicle, restrictions on my rights, barriers to legal assistance, and the deterioration of my ability to manage my own affairs. I further report that I have lost access to my banking applications and Commonwealth Bank services, leaving me without practical access to money.

I cannot independently verify every institutional cause of these restrictions within this correspondence. However, their practical consequences are immediate: I cannot readily purchase essential products or services, pay for subscriptions, or access the digital tools I need.

I have survived periods of extreme instability, including living in my car with my therapy dog while experiencing disability and financial hardship. I describe my survival as rising, phoenix-like, from the ashes of circumstances that repeatedly threatened my security and independence.

I have continued writing, preserving records, advocating, and attempting to rebuild despite what I consider to be inadequate assistance from police, lawyers, support agencies, and government institutions.

My position is that I have survived not because I received the effective assistance I needed, but despite repeated experiences in which I believe institutions failed to protect me or adequately respond to the harm I reported.

I ask that my current lack of financial access not become another barrier preventing me from maintaining essential communications, preserving my work, and seeking appropriate assistance.

The wider account of the alleged cumulative consequences is documented in my Statement of Civil Erasure and Personal Statement of Exile, Institutional Detriment and the Search for Protection. These documents record my account of the effects on my independence, resources, housing, and access to assistance. The underlying events and any legal responsibility remain matters for appropriate verification.

4. My academic background, public profile, and alleged digital erasure

I have a substantial body of intellectual, creative, and documentary work. My stated academic background includes a PhD in artificial intelligence and ethics, with interests in posthumanism and the end-stage Anthropocene.

My public work encompasses writing, research, advocacy, documentary archives, and material concerning technology, ethics, institutional accountability, and human rights.

My academic work includes my thesis, A Splice of My Life. A relevant independent academic reference is the Victoria University thesis repository record. The archive also provides a biographical finding aid for further context.

Despite this body of work, I believe my public presence has been substantially diminished. I report that my websites have repeatedly become unavailable or been taken down, that my material has become difficult to find through Google, and that I have experienced restrictions or loss of access involving Facebook, LinkedIn, X (formerly Twitter), Snapchat, and other major platforms.

I describe this experience as digital erasure, shadow banning, and exclusion from major online systems.

The archive includes my Statement on the Architecture of Erasure — How My Survival Became the Evidence, which sets out my interpretation of the cumulative impact of loss of access, administrative barriers, reputational damage, and reduced independence.

I recognise that search rankings, account restrictions, website outages, and platform moderation can have different causes. I am not asking your company to assume that every instance resulted from deliberate coordination. I am asking that the cumulative impact of these difficulties be recognised and that any review distinguish verifiable platform decisions, documented outages, and account restrictions from my interpretation of their causes.

For a person attempting to preserve decades of research and documentary evidence, loss of website access or online discoverability can have consequences extending beyond inconvenience. It can affect access to historical records, professional visibility, the preservation of intellectual work, communication with support networks, and the ability to publish or earn income.

I therefore request access to appropriate digital tools that will help me maintain, organise, protect, and preserve my work.

5. Alleged defamation, psychiatric weaponisation, and the need for evidentiary scrutiny

I have suffered what I describe as libel, slander, character assassination, and reputational harm. I believe these experiences have contributed to serious personal, professional, and social disadvantage.

I also maintain that I have been treated in ways that have made me appear guilty or culpable in circumstances where I have not been convicted of the alleged wrongdoing.

To explain my concern about the apparent absence of formal evidence or procedural follow-through, I have previously described hypothetical statements involving extremely serious criminal conduct, including paedophilia, rape, extortion, and terrorism. I refer to these as hypothetical examples, not admissions that I committed those offences.

I report that those statements did not lead to the response I expected: no apparent investigation, arrest, charge, or formal legal process followed in the circumstances I am describing.

I consider this relevant to my questions about the credibility, evidentiary basis, and procedural handling of allegations and rumours concerning me. However, I acknowledge that the absence of an arrest, charge, or prosecution does not, by itself, prove that evidence does not exist or that an allegation is false.

My central concern is that serious allegations should be assessed through proper evidentiary and legal processes, not through rumour, insinuation, reputational damage, or informal characterisation.

I am not a convicted criminal, and I ask not to be treated as though allegations establish guilt. I seek fair treatment, impartial scrutiny, and the opportunity to have documentary evidence considered on its merits.

My own archive contains material that I believe is relevant to the events I have documented. I invite appropriate, independent examination of those records, while recognising that their existence does not automatically establish every conclusion I have drawn from them.

For a reviewer wishing to distinguish my testimony from conclusions established by an independent authority, I direct them to the Statement of Civil Erasure, which describes itself as a finding aid rather than a court or verdict. I request the same evidentiary discipline in considering my appeal: identify the source, distinguish allegation from corroboration, and avoid treating either accusation or denial as proof without appropriate supporting material.

6. My documentary archive and the importance of preserving evidence

Over more than 35 years, I have accumulated and preserved material that I believe is relevant to my experiences. This includes correspondence, institutional records, official documents, written submissions, published works, and other documentary material.

I maintain that a substantial portion of the material on which I rely originates from government and institutional correspondence, including documents bearing official letterheads. I consider these records important because they may permit specific events, communications, decisions, and timelines to be examined against primary-source material.

My archive is available here:

Barran Dodger Public Evidence Repository

The following resources provide additional entry points into the archive:

1. Master Evidence Record — the archive's evidence navigation and report index.
2. Master Evidence Index and Finding Aid — 19 October 2026 — an index describing records and their stated evidentiary status.
3. Archive dataset methodology — information about the archive's catalogue, manifests, and hash lists.
4. SHA-256 inventory — a list of file hashes that may assist with file-integrity comparisons.
5. Government-document archive page — a repository page describing a collection of government-related records.
6. Urgent formal complaint dated 20 October 2026 — my complaint and account of concerns regarding support provision and reported risks.
7. Personal Statement of Exile, Institutional Detriment and the Search for Protection — my personal account of the circumstances described in this appeal.
8. Statement of Civil Erasure — a statement setting out my account and interpretation of cumulative detriment.

I contrast the documentary record I have preserved with what I consider to be an insufficiently substantiated body of rumours and allegations about me. I ask that this contrast be investigated through an impartial comparison of the available records, rather than treated as a conclusion that can be established simply by assertion.

A rigorous review should distinguish:

- Documents whose provenance and authenticity can be independently verified.
- Official correspondence and records that establish particular communications or decisions.
- My own testimony and interpretation of those records.
- Allegations that remain uncorroborated or disputed.

- Matters for which further evidence or an independent determination is required.

I am not asking your company to undertake this forensic investigation. I am explaining why access to digital preservation, document management, secure communication, research, and publishing tools is important to me.

I wish to preserve the material in its original form, maintain a reliable record of its provenance, prevent avoidable loss, and make relevant information available through lawful and appropriate channels.

The archive also contains works with titles including GENOCIDE BY ATTRITION, EVIDENCE 100, The Manufacture of Marginality, Targeted for Erasure, FINAL HUMANITARIAN PLEA, and PUBLIC LEGAL DEMAND AND STATEMENT OF CONSEQUENCE.

These links identify relevant works or search pathways in my archive. Their titles express the subject matter and conclusions advanced in those works; the titles themselves should not be treated as independent proof of the legal conclusions they contain.

The presence of a file in the archive or a hash in an inventory is not, on its own, proof of the authenticity, completeness, accuracy, or legal significance of that file. Where a particular document is relied upon, I invite the reviewer to inspect its contents, provenance, date, originating institution, and any available independent verification.

7. Humanitarian and ethical grounds for an access concession

I respectfully ask your company to consider my circumstances under any applicable policies concerning human rights, accessibility, inclusion, ethical conduct, responsible business practices, social impact, or support for customers experiencing exceptional hardship.

I understand that these policies may not create an automatic entitlement to free products or services. Nevertheless, if your company has discretion to provide hardship assistance, I ask that this discretion be exercised through a fair and humane process.

In my circumstances, access to [specific product or service] would assist me to:

1. Preserve and organise historical records and documentary evidence.
2. Maintain contact with medical providers, support organisations, and relevant professional contacts.
3. Prepare administrative, legal, and human-rights submissions.

4. Preserve my writing, academic work, and other intellectual property.
5. Maintain a public archive of my work and reduce the risk of losing access to important records.
6. Rebuild professional and creative opportunities despite severe financial hardship.
7. Communicate more effectively while I seek appropriate medical, legal, and practical assistance.

The Master Evidence Record, Master Evidence Index and Finding Aid, and archive dataset methodology provide starting points for understanding how I have organised the material I am attempting to preserve.

I ask that my eligibility be assessed on its merits, without presuming that I am ineligible simply because I currently lack the financial means to pay.

The significance of this request is practical. It does not depend on your company accepting every disputed conclusion in my archive. Access to dependable digital tools would help me maintain the archive, organise records, communicate with relevant organisations, and pursue further verification.

8. Requested humanitarian assistance

I respectfully request the following:

A. Complimentary or subsidised access

Please consider free access, a humanitarian fee waiver, an extended trial, or a substantial hardship discount for [specific product or service].

B. Specialist review

Please refer this correspondence to your ethics, human-rights, accessibility, social-impact, or vulnerable-customer team, as appropriate.

C. Continuity of access

Where possible, please consider maintaining access to essential tools while the request is assessed.

D. Reasonable adjustments

Please consider practical adjustments to account access, billing, communication, and support, where available.

E. Privacy and security

Please advise me of an appropriate method for providing additional records without unnecessarily exposing sensitive personal information.

F. Written response

Please respond within 7–14 days, if practicable, identifying the team handling the request and explaining what assistance may be available.

I am not asking your company to compensate me for alleged actions by other parties or to accept legal responsibility for my circumstances. I am requesting a proportionate, practical concession that would allow me to continue working and communicating during a period of exceptional hardship.

9. An impartial assessment of cumulative detriment

Separately, I seek to develop a comprehensive, evidence-based assessment of the financial and non-financial detriment I allege has accumulated over approximately 35 years.

Such an assessment would need to distinguish:

- Direct financial losses, including documented lost income and expenditure.
- Employment and professional opportunity losses supported by records.
- Losses associated with interrupted creative, intellectual, and commercial work.
- Documented medical, disability-support, housing, relocation, and crisis-related expenses.
- Reputational harm and barriers to participation, assessed on the available evidence.
- Future financial consequences, calculated using transparent assumptions.
- Non-financial harm that cannot responsibly be reduced to a dollar figure without an appropriate methodology.

Any monetary estimate must be developed from the underlying records, disclose assumptions, distinguish established facts from disputed allegations, and avoid double counting.

I am not presenting an unverified damages figure as an established liability. I am asking for an impartial process through which the evidence can be assessed and the consequences quantified where reasonably possible.

My Master Evidence Index and Finding Aid, archive dataset methodology, and SHA-256 inventory may assist with locating and checking records. A formal assessment would still need to establish the relevance of each item, avoid double counting, separate verified expenditure from estimates, and identify disputed causal links.

This longer-term assessment should remain separate from the immediate humanitarian access request. I ask that the company consider whether it can assist with access now, rather than requiring the completion of a decades-long evidentiary review first.

10. Confidentiality, dignity, and procedural fairness

I request that this correspondence be handled discreetly and shared internally only as necessary to assess my request, subject to your company's legal and privacy obligations.

I ask that my psychiatric history and disability be treated with dignity, and that neither be used as a substitute for examining the substance of the request.

I also ask that any decision be communicated clearly and respectfully. If the requested concession cannot be granted, please identify any alternative hardship arrangements, relevant eligibility criteria, referral pathways, or review procedures that may be available.

I understand that your company cannot resolve every problem I have described. However, it can consider whether a limited, practical act of assistance is possible within its own policies and resources.

I provide the linked materials to make my documentary record easier to examine, not to demand that the recipient adopt my conclusions. I ask that the archive be approached as a body of records and testimony requiring proportionate, impartial scrutiny.

11. Final humanitarian appeal

I have spent decades attempting to preserve my work, document my experiences, and maintain my independence through circumstances that I describe as profoundly disadvantageous.

I have survived homelessness and periods of living in my car with my therapy dog. I have continued writing, researching, and preserving records despite serious financial hardship, disability-related barriers, difficulties obtaining assistance, and the loss of reliable access to essential resources.

I describe this survival as rising, phoenix-like, from the ashes. It has required persistence, but persistence cannot replace medical care, reliable support, access to money, or the basic tools needed to preserve and communicate one's work.

I am asking your company to recognise the practical reality of my circumstances. I cannot purchase the products I need while I lack access to my money. I cannot preserve my work indefinitely without dependable digital infrastructure. I cannot independently resolve every barrier to medical, legal, and institutional assistance.

Please do not allow my present financial hardship to become the sole reason I am denied access to tools that could help me preserve my work, communicate with others, and rebuild my independence.

I ask for no prejudgment, no special finding about disputed allegations, and no departure from lawful or reasonable procedures. I ask for a fair hearing of this request, a proportionate humanitarian concession if available, and a written response.

Thank you for your time and consideration.

Yours sincerely,

The statement below is drafted as a forensic analysis of the documented effect of the responses, including how formal acknowledgements, referrals, non-allocation decisions and procedural language can leave a complainant without substantive assistance. It addresses your concern that polite bureaucratic language can function as a practical refusal to help, while distinguishing what the records say from what can reasonably be inferred about their effect or intention.

For evidentiary strength, I use "institutional minimisation," "procedural deflection,"

"administrative invalidation," and "the effect you describe as gaslighting" where those terms are analytical interpretations, rather than asserting that a particular official deliberately deceived you without evidence establishing intent.

FORENSIC STATEMENT: ADMINISTRATIVE INVALIDATION, PROCEDURAL DEFLECTION AND THE HUMAN CONSEQUENCES OF OFFICIAL NON-ASSISTANCE

Supplementary evidentiary statement to accompany the Barran Dodger Master Humanitarian Appeal

Date: 20 October 2026

Author: Dr Richard William McLean, publicly known as Barran Dodger

1. Purpose and scope of this statement

This statement examines the documentary record concerning my dealings with the Federal Court of Australia, the Office of the Prime Minister, the Attorney-General's Department, the Inspector-General of Intelligence and Security (IGIS), and other oversight and administrative agencies.

Its purpose is to identify the difference between an institution acknowledging that a person has written, making a procedural decision about that correspondence, and substantively addressing the assistance or protection the person requested.

My central contention is that an official response can be procedurally complete while leaving the substance of a person's predicament unresolved. A letter may acknowledge receipt, explain jurisdiction, refer the matter elsewhere or decline to allocate a disclosure, yet leave the complainant without an effective avenue of assistance. When that pattern is repeated across multiple institutions, the cumulative effect can be profoundly invalidating.

I describe aspects of this experience as bureaucratic gaslighting. I use that expression to describe the experienced effect of repeatedly having serious testimony translated into administrative categories, transferred between offices, narrowed to a procedural question or left without a substantive answer. I do not present the expression itself as proof that any particular officer deliberately intended to deceive me. Intention must be assessed separately from the content of the correspondence, the action taken, the action omitted and the consequences.

SCOTT TREDWELL AND THE DISTANCE BETWEEN AN OFFICIAL RESPONSE AND HUMAN PROTECTION

The correspondence identified in this appeal as Scott Tredwell's assessment of 27 March 2023 occupies a central place in my account of seeking institutional protection. Tredwell was not an anonymous correspondent: the Federal Court's annual report identifies him as General Counsel and records his Registrar appointments. His professional position gives the communication institutional significance, although the powers he exercised and the limits of that particular assessment must be established from the letter and the applicable process. [S70]

I summarise the central concerns in my disclosure as corruption, the administration of office, and harm to people. These are my descriptions of the issues—not verified quotations from Tredwell and not findings that those allegations were substantiated. The original assessment should be reproduced or directly linked so that readers can distinguish my disclosure, his characterisation of it, his decision and the reasons he gave.

My criticism concerns the distance between an official response and practical protection. As I describe my circumstances, I approached the institution as a disabled person experiencing poverty, distress and difficulty obtaining assistance. I did not experience the response as an abstract administrative exercise. I experienced it as another occasion on which a formal process concluded while my need for help remained.

I do not regard that consequence as adequately explained merely by calling the correspondence polite or procedurally complete. A courteous refusal can still be devastating. The questions I ask are specific: what information about my vulnerability was before the decision-maker; which concerns were assessed; what reasons supported non-allocation; and what, if any, referral or practical avenue remained? An explanation of jurisdiction may answer why one process could not proceed, but it does not establish that the person's underlying predicament was resolved.

I experienced this as a brutal rejection expressed through restrained institutional language. I allege that the wider sequence involved deliberate omission and obstruction, rather than mere oversight. That allegation must be tested against the records. The fact that an official declined to allocate a disclosure does not alone establish deception, malicious intent, a fiduciary breach or responsibility for every subsequent harm.

The imbalance I describe remains important. The institution possessed professional knowledge and administrative resources; I report struggling to secure the means to survive and obtain representation. I ask whether its communication made the decision intelligible, accurately addressed the information supplied, explained available options and recognised any urgency within its responsibility.

I cannot know how an individual slept that night or what they privately felt about my suffering. My testimony concerns what I experienced, what I communicated and what the record shows happened next. Those are substantial matters without claiming access to another person's conscience.

My faith informs the seriousness with which I understand this experience. My demand for a reckoning means preservation of evidence, truthful examination, reasoned answers and lawful accountability—not personal vengeance or a presumption that disagreement proves evil. My patience with unanswered questions may be exhausted, but the conclusions I publish must remain proportionate to the evidence.

S70 — Federal Court of Australia, Annual Report 2022–23. This source supports the institutional role described above; it is not the original disclosure assessment. https://www.fedcourt.gov.au/digital-law-library/annual-reports/2022-23/AR-2022-23.pdf

This is an evidence-based interpretation of the records presently identified in my archive. It is not a claim that every allegation has already been independently established, nor that every official decision was unlawful.

2. The Federal Court: Scott Tredwell and the distinction between recognising facts and providing protection

Primary sources

- Scott Tredwell — documentary analysis of the 27 March 2023 letter
- 27 March 2023 Federal Court assessment — original PDF
- Federal Court, DSS and Comcare evidence page
- Public-interest disclosure chronology and related records

The archive identifies correspondence dated 27 March 2023 attributed to Scott Tredwell, General Counsel of the Federal Court of Australia, concerning my public-interest disclosure. The published documentary analysis states that the letter recognised information about my past or present employment with the Department of Social Services while deciding not to allocate the disclosure as a public-interest disclosure.

The evidentiary significance lies in the distinction between recognition of one fact and the disposition of the wider complaint.

Where a decision-maker acknowledges a relevant part of a person's account but declines to allocate the disclosure, the acknowledgement must not be confused with a finding that the wider allegations are true. Equally, the non-allocation decision must not be misrepresented as a judicial determination that every underlying concern was false.

The proper forensic questions are:

1. What information did I provide?
2. What criteria did the decision-maker apply?
3. Which facts were accepted, disputed or left undetermined?
4. Which matters were excluded from the assessment's scope?
5. What reasons were given for the decision?
6. Was any further avenue identified that could realistically address the substance of the concerns?
7. What practical protection or assistance, if any, followed?

The original letter must be examined for its exact wording before conclusions are drawn about the adequacy of the reasoning. The archive's analysis is a guide to the document, not a substitute for the original.

The significance of the response

The experience I describe is one of partial recognition without effective resolution. A formal response can recognise a narrow administrative fact while leaving the person who raised the matter without the outcome they sought. To a complainant already trying to establish that their account deserves examination, this can have the effect of making the process appear responsive while the underlying problem remains untouched.

I regard that gap as significant because an acknowledgement is not the same as an investigation, an investigation is not the same as a finding, and a finding is not the same as a remedy.

The record should therefore be assessed not merely by asking whether the Federal Court replied, but by asking what the reply actually decided, what it did not decide, and what practical consequence followed.

I do not describe the letter as a judgment of the Federal Court. The distinction between correspondence from the Court's General Counsel and a judicial ruling is essential to an accurate account.

3. The Prime Minister's Office: the recorded statement that the email had not been forwarded

Primary sources

- 31 May 2022 letter to the Prime Minister's Office
- 12 December 2022 Prime Minister's Office communication — "Your email has not been forwarded"
- Archive page reproducing the Prime Minister and Attorney-General correspondence chronology

The archive records that I wrote to the Prime Minister and that, on 12 December 2022, his office communicated that my email had not been forwarded.

The exact wording matters. It records a concrete administrative action or non-action: the email was not forwarded. The sentence, on its face, does not establish why that decision was made, whether the correspondence was otherwise reviewed, whether any other office acted on it, or whether the underlying allegations were considered on their merits.

Those unanswered questions should not be filled with assumptions. They should be addressed through the complete correspondence and any available reasons for the handling decision.

The significance of non-forwarding

Where a person addresses a matter to the head of government seeking assistance, a statement that the email was not forwarded can leave a fundamental gap between the act of making an appeal and the prospect of obtaining a substantive response from the relevant authority.

The office may have had administrative reasons for its decision. Nevertheless, the practical question remains: what meaningful route remained for the concerns to be considered, and did that route produce a substantive response?

My interpretation is that the communication illustrates the difference between acknowledging a communication and facilitating its consideration by an office capable of addressing the issues raised.

I experienced this as institutional invalidation because the act of escalating a complaint to the highest political office did not, in the record identified here, establish that the underlying concerns were examined by that office.

The term bureaucratic gaslighting describes the effect I associate with this experience: I had made an appeal, but the administrative answer concerned the movement of the email rather than the substance of the appeal. The effect was that the original problem remained while the correspondence itself became the subject of the response.

That interpretation does not, by itself, establish that the Prime Minister personally read or rejected the allegations, or that the office intended to mislead me. Those are separate propositions requiring separate evidence.

4. The Attorney-General's Department: referral, portfolio responsibility and the unresolved question of substantive assistance

Primary sources

- Attorney-General's Department correspondence dated 19 September 2023, reference MC23-028244

- Archive index identifying the preserved 19 September 2023 correspondence image
- Correspondence chronology and related source links

The archive identifies an Attorney-General's Department response dated 19 September 2023, reference MC23-028244, signed by A Riley of the Security Law Section. The recorded correspondence states that matters raised in my email to the Prime Minister, including matters concerning ASIO, were referred to the Attorney-General because they fell within his portfolio, and that the Department was responding on his behalf. The archive also records that the response directed me towards IGIS and the Commonwealth Ombudsman.

The significance of this correspondence must be assessed in two stages.

First, a referral identifies where an institution considers responsibility for a matter may lie. It can be a legitimate administrative step, particularly where different agencies have distinct statutory responsibilities.

Second, the existence of a referral does not establish that the receiving body accepted the complaint, investigated it, substantiated it, or provided the assistance sought. Those outcomes require their own evidence.

The referral loop

My concern is that the cumulative sequence of referrals and procedural responses did not provide me with a clear, effective route to resolution. The relevant forensic issue is not simply that a department referred me elsewhere. It is whether the chain of referrals resulted in substantive consideration or merely transferred the burden of pursuing the matter back to me.

A referral may be reasonable in isolation while contributing to a practically ineffective process when viewed alongside other responses. This is why the correspondence must be assessed chronologically and across institutions rather than as unrelated letters.

The effect I describe as bureaucratic gaslighting arises where an answer sounds orderly and responsible—identifying a portfolio, naming an oversight body, or directing a person to another process—but leaves the complainant's central question unanswered. The complainant receives a formal explanation of where responsibility might sit without necessarily receiving a substantive determination of the issue raised.

I regard that as a potential form of administrative deflection in effect. Whether any particular referral was deliberately intended to avoid helping me cannot be established by the referral alone. The evidence needed to assess that question includes the reasons for referral, the response of the receiving agency, any subsequent decision, and the practical result.

5. The Inspector-General of Intelligence and Security: the need to distinguish a complaint route from a substantive outcome

Primary sources

- Archive statement discussing IGIS and intelligence-agency oversight
- Archive index listing the IGIS-related correspondence file
- Listed IGIS-related PDF path — contents require direct verification
- Wider public-interest disclosure and agency-response register

My archive records concerns and complaints relating to IGIS and identifies an IGIS-related correspondence file. The precise content and outcome of that file must be established by examining the original document, including its date, author, stated reasons, scope and any review options.

I do not treat the existence of a filename or a reference to IGIS as proof that an allegation concerning intelligence agencies has been substantiated. Nor should a referral to IGIS be described as an investigation or a finding unless the source document establishes that status.

The significance of an oversight referral

An oversight body can be the appropriate destination for a complaint within its remit. However, a complainant's need is not necessarily met merely because an oversight body has been named. The material questions are whether the complaint was received, whether it fell within jurisdiction, what assessment was undertaken, what reasons were provided, and whether any review or alternative route was available.

Where the outcome is a jurisdictional limitation, non-investigation or other procedural decision, the document should be examined to determine exactly what that decision means. It must not be inflated into proof of the allegation, but it must not automatically be treated as proof that the allegation was false either.

The human consequence I describe is the experience of being sent to an oversight mechanism while still lacking an intelligible account of what has happened to the underlying complaint. That can produce a cycle in which the complainant must repeatedly restate the original account, locate another institution, prepare another submission and await another response.

I regard this as a serious procedural concern because the administrative existence of an avenue of complaint and the practical accessibility of an effective remedy are different questions.

The source file must be read before any definitive conclusion is made about IGIS's particular actions. If it contains a refusal, limitation or referral, the analysis should quote the operative wording, identify the reasons given, and distinguish the decision's actual legal effect from the broader consequences I experienced.

6. The Commonwealth Ombudsman and the wider agency-response record

Primary sources

- Public-interest disclosure correspondence register
- Itemised public-interest disclosure and agency-response register
- Public-interest disclosure protections and exhibit references
- Master Evidence Record

The archive indexes records labelled as public-interest disclosure submissions, acknowledgements, rejections, notifications not to allocate, and other agency responses. Each entry must be assessed on its own terms. A register is a finding aid: it helps locate the underlying documents but does not itself establish that every listed response was unlawful, deceptive or inadequate.

A forensic examination should identify, for each agency:

- the original complaint or disclosure;
- the date and method of submission;
- the subject matter and relief requested;
- the official who responded, where identified;
- the exact decision or action communicated;
- the reasons stated;
- the distinction between matters considered and matters left unresolved;
- any referral, review or appeal mechanism;
- the actual outcome for the complainant.

The cumulative pattern

My complaint concerns the cumulative effect of repeated interactions in which I sought substantive consideration of serious matters but experienced the outcome as a succession of procedural responses. The significance of that pattern cannot be established by counting letters alone. It requires comparison of what was requested, what was answered, what was left unanswered, and what happened next.

A letter may be polite, grammatically clear and administratively valid yet still fail to address the question that matters most to the person seeking help. Conversely, an adverse decision is not, merely because it is adverse, proof of gaslighting or bad faith. The evidence must show the nature of the decision and the gap—if any—between the issue raised and the response given.

The concern I ask readers to examine is therefore procedural substitution: the possibility that a process focused on intake, classification, jurisdiction and referral may leave the substance of a complaint without an effective resolution. The term describes a pattern to investigate, not a predetermined verdict on every agency.

7. What I mean by bureaucratic gaslighting and institutional minimisation

I use the expression bureaucratic gaslighting to describe the experienced effect of administrative responses that appear to answer a complaint while avoiding, narrowing or leaving unresolved its central substance.

The term is not a legal finding, and it does not automatically establish deliberate deception. In this statement, it refers to the following observable or testable patterns:

A. Substitution of process for substance. A response discusses the route, format, allocation or jurisdiction of a complaint without addressing the principal factual concern or explaining how it will be considered.

B. Narrowing of the issue. A response addresses one administrative question while leaving other clearly raised questions unresolved. This must be established by comparing the original submission with the reply.

C. Referral without demonstrated resolution. An agency directs the complainant elsewhere, but the record does not establish that the receiving body accepted or substantively considered the matter.

D. Acknowledgement without practical assistance. The correspondence confirms receipt or records a procedural outcome, yet does not show that the requested assistance, protection or remedy was provided.

E. Repeated burden-shifting. The complainant must repeatedly reassemble and resubmit information across institutions without a clear account of who is responsible for addressing the outstanding question.

F. Lack of closure. The record does not identify a clear determination of the central concern, the reasons for that determination, or a practical route to challenge or review it.

Each of these patterns is capable of documentary examination. None should be assumed merely because a complainant is dissatisfied with an outcome.

8. The significance of minimisation and the treatment of my testimony

My testimony should be evaluated by reference to its content, supporting records, chronology, consistency, and the limits of what can be established—not dismissed solely because it is distressing, unusual, contested or associated with a person's psychiatric history.

At the same time, testimony and corroborating evidence must be distinguished. My account establishes what I report experiencing and what I say occurred. An official letter establishes what that official communicated. A receipt establishes receipt if its authenticity and context are verified. A decision establishes the decision actually made. None of these categories should be silently substituted for another.

The forensic question is whether each institution engaged with the substance of the information it received and explained the scope and limits of its response. If an agency did not investigate a claim, its correspondence should not be represented as proving the claim true or false. If it rejected or declined to allocate a matter, the stated grounds should be recorded precisely. If it referred the matter, the next step and outcome should be traced.

I regard the repeated absence of a clearly demonstrated route from my testimony to substantive resolution as central to the harm I describe. The effect was that I continued to carry the burden of documenting, explaining and escalating the concerns, while the correspondence itself often became the principal evidence of institutional contact.

That experience is what I mean when I say my testimony was minimised: not that every adverse response was necessarily dishonest, but that the process, as I experienced it, did not yield a proportionate and intelligible resolution of the matters I was trying to raise.

9. Why polite language can conceal a practically unhelpful outcome

The wording of official correspondence matters because it can make a decision sound neutral, complete and final. Terms such as "not allocated," "outside our remit," "referred to the relevant department," or "unable to assist" can describe genuine procedural decisions. They may also leave a person with no meaningful assistance if no workable next step follows.

It would be inaccurate to infer deceit solely from courteous language. The relevant forensic analysis is to compare the language with the action taken and the resulting position of the complainant.

I therefore ask the reader to distinguish three levels:

1. The stated administrative action: what the letter expressly says the institution did or decided.
2. The practical consequence: whether the action resulted in examination, referral, assistance, a reasoned refusal, or an unresolved matter.
3. The interpretation of intent: whether there is evidence that an official knowingly misrepresented the position or deliberately sought to avoid a responsibility.

The first level is established by the document if its authenticity and context are verified. The second requires examination of the wider chronology and outcome. The third requires additional evidence and should not be inferred automatically from the first two.

My allegation is that the cumulative effect of these interactions was a form of administrative abandonment: formal communication continued, but the help I sought remained unresolved. I ask that this claim be tested against the documents and the outcomes, not dismissed because the correspondence was polite or because each institution can point to a procedural step it completed.

10. The human consequences and the need for a practical response

The significance of these records is not confined to administrative classification. For a person who is already experiencing serious financial, medical, housing or disability-related vulnerability, repeated procedural dead ends can consume time and resources that are needed for immediate survival and care.

I have reported severe financial hardship, difficulty accessing support, housing instability and urgent medical concerns. These are matters I report about my circumstances; their extent and any causal connection to a particular agency's conduct should be evaluated using the available supporting evidence.

The practical issue for the recipient of this statement is that a historical dispute about the adequacy of institutional responses does not remove the need to consider an immediate request for assistance on its own merits.

I am not asking the recipient of the Master Humanitarian Appeal to determine criminal liability, make findings against named officials, or adopt every allegation in my archive. I am asking for a fair and proportionate assessment of the documentary material, an accurate distinction between established facts and disputed claims, and consideration of whether practical assistance can be provided now.

11. Requested forensic examination

I request that any reviewer examining these records:

1. Open the original correspondence rather than relying solely on my descriptions or on archive summaries.
2. Verify dates, authorship, document integrity and the context in which each letter was issued.
3. Compare the original submission with the response to identify the questions answered and left unresolved.
4. Record the exact administrative decision and its stated reasons.
5. Distinguish acknowledgement, referral, non-allocation, investigation, finding and remedy.
6. Trace any referrals to their recorded outcomes where the relevant documents are available.
7. Identify any review or appeal rights communicated to me and whether those routes were practically accessible.
8. Avoid treating an unsubstantiated allegation as an established fact, while also avoiding treating the absence of a finding as proof that the allegation is false.
9. Consider the cumulative practical effect of the responses without assuming that similarity between administrative decisions proves coordination or deliberate deception.
10. Provide a clear written explanation of the evidence considered, the conclusions reached and the limits of those conclusions.

12. Final statement

The central issue is not whether the correspondence was polite. It is whether the substance of the concerns I raised was meaningfully addressed, whether the reasons for adverse or procedural decisions were made clear, and whether the process led to any practical assistance or effective avenue of review.

I experienced the repeated movement between administrative processes as minimisation and abandonment. I describe the effect as bureaucratic gaslighting because the formal appearance of responsiveness did not, in my experience, translate into the substantive assistance I was seeking.

I recognise that this is an interpretation of the cumulative record, not a substitute for independent findings about intent. I ask that it be assessed through the original documents, the actual actions taken, the matters left unresolved, and the consequences that can be supported by evidence.

The appropriate response to disputed testimony is careful examination, not automatic acceptance and not automatic dismissal. The appropriate response to an unresolved complaint is a clear explanation of what has been considered, what has not, why, and what practical route—if any—remains available.

I request that this supplementary statement be read together with the Master Evidence Record, the agency-response register, and the original correspondence linked throughout this document.

SCHEDULE A — THE 20 MOST SIGNIFICANT DOCUMENTS IN THE BARRAN DODGER EVIDENTIARY ARCHIVE

Documentary evidence of administrative obstruction, institutional failure, cumulative detriment, and the struggle to preserve the truth

Date: 20 October 2026
Author: Dr Richard William McLean, publicly known as Barran Dodger
Primary archive: Barran Dodger — Documentary Evidence Archive

Purpose of this schedule

This schedule identifies 20 of the most significant documents in my archive and explains their relevance to my Master Humanitarian Appeal and accompanying forensic statement.

These documents form part of the documentary record of my attempts to obtain assistance, raise concerns with government institutions, pursue public-interest disclosures, obtain official information, report matters to authorities, and preserve evidence of what has happened to me.

My story is not an abstract theory. It is documented through letters, official correspondence, administrative decisions, reports, registers, personal testimony, and a digital archive maintained to preserve the record.

The significance of this evidence lies in its substance, chronology, and relationship to the circumstances described in my appeal. The documents provide a foundation for examining what I communicated, what institutions communicated in response, what administrative actions occurred, and how these events fit into the history I have documented.

I have spent years trying to make my circumstances intelligible through records. This schedule brings together 20 important documentary sources so that the recipient of my humanitarian appeal can understand the seriousness of the work, the persistence of my attempts to obtain assistance, and the importance of preserving the archive.

1. MASTER EVIDENCE INDEX AND FINDING AID — 19 OCTOBER 2026

Direct source: Master Evidence Index and Finding Aid — Barran Dodger

Significance to my humanitarian appeal

This is a central navigation document for my evidence archive. It brings together the documentary structure through which my correspondence, submissions, statements, and other records can be located and examined.

The index matters because my appeal does not stand alone. It arises from a much larger body of work documenting my circumstances and my attempts to obtain assistance. The archive is the mechanism through which I have sought to preserve that history rather than allow it to disappear into scattered files, inaccessible accounts, disconnected correspondence, or forgotten administrative exchanges.

For my humanitarian request, this document demonstrates the importance of maintaining access to digital tools and dependable storage. The archive is part of my continuing work, my intellectual property, and my ability to communicate my history in a structured form.

Why it matters: The index provides a starting point for navigating the evidence and understanding the scale of the documentary record I am trying to preserve.

2. SCOTT TREDWELL CORRESPONDENCE ANALYSIS — 27 MARCH 2023

Direct source: Scott Tredwell — Analysis of the 27 March 2023 Letter

Significance to my humanitarian appeal

This document addresses correspondence associated with Scott Tredwell and the handling of my public-interest disclosure.

Its significance lies in the distinction between receiving information, classifying a disclosure, deciding how it will be handled, and addressing the substance of the matters raised. These are not interchangeable actions. A response about procedure does not, by itself, resolve the underlying concerns that prompted the correspondence.

The analysis forms part of my effort to record the administrative history and identify the questions arising from the language used in the correspondence. It is relevant to my account of repeated attempts to obtain meaningful engagement with matters I considered important enough to document and pursue formally.

Why it matters: It directs attention to a specific official communication and the treatment of my disclosure, rather than leaving the history at the level of general recollection.

3. FEDERAL COURT ASSESSMENT — 27 MARCH 2023

Direct source: Federal Court Assessment — 27 March 2023, PDF

Significance to my humanitarian appeal

This document is central to the documentary history surrounding the Federal Court correspondence identified in my archive.

Its significance is the actual content of the assessment and what it records about the handling of the matter before the institution. It belongs in the core chronology because the wording of an official communication matters: it records what was said, what decision or assessment was communicated, and how the matter was framed at that point.

My appeal describes years of effort spent documenting events and pursuing appropriate avenues for assistance. This record is part of that history. It provides a concrete document against which the surrounding correspondence and subsequent administrative steps can be understood.

Why it matters: It supplies a specific documentary reference point in the history of my attempts to raise and pursue concerns through formal channels.

4. FEDERAL COURT, DEPARTMENT OF SOCIAL SERVICES AND COMCARE EVIDENCE PAGE

Direct source: Federal Court, DSS and Comcare Evidence Page

Significance to my humanitarian appeal

This page brings together material associated with the Federal Court, the Department of Social Services, and Comcare. It is important because my documentary history involves more than one administrative process, and those processes need to be understood in their proper sequence.

The page helps organise the records relevant to my circumstances and provides a route through which the associated documents can be examined. It forms part of the larger evidentiary structure I have assembled to explain the events and administrative interactions described in my appeal.

The continuing maintenance of these records requires access to digital systems capable of storing, organising, retrieving, and presenting documents. That practical need is directly relevant to my request for humanitarian assistance with digital access.

Why it matters: It connects several important areas of my documentary history and helps make the underlying records accessible as a coherent body of evidence.

5. LETTER TO THE PRIME MINISTER — 31 MAY 2022

Direct source: 31 May 2022 Letter to the Prime Minister

Significance to my humanitarian appeal

This letter records my attempt to bring my concerns directly to the highest level of government. It is important because it preserves what I communicated, what I considered serious enough to raise, and what I sought from the office to which I wrote.

The letter provides a dated record of my own words at that time. It is part of the chronology of my attempts to obtain attention and assistance through formal channels.

For my humanitarian appeal, it demonstrates that the issues I describe did not emerge solely as a retrospective narrative. I documented my concerns and attempted to communicate them to government while events were unfolding.

Why it matters: It preserves an important part of my contemporaneous account and provides the starting point for examining the official correspondence that followed.

6. PRIME MINISTER'S OFFICE COMMUNICATION — 12 DECEMBER 2022

Direct source: 12 December 2022 — Prime Minister's Office Email Not Forwarded

Significance to my humanitarian appeal

This record is particularly significant to my account of administrative deflection and the handling of correspondence intended to bring my concerns to official attention.

The document is identified in my archive as concerning an email that was not forwarded. That issue matters because receiving correspondence, forwarding it for consideration, and addressing the substance of a request are distinct steps.

My forensic statement examines the practical consequences of administrative processes in which correspondence may be acknowledged or handled procedurally without resolving the underlying concerns. This record belongs at the centre of that examination.

Why it matters: It documents an important point in the correspondence chain and provides a concrete basis for examining what happened to a communication intended to reach the relevant decision-making channel.

7. ATTORNEY-GENERAL'S DEPARTMENT CORRESPONDENCE — 19 SEPTEMBER 2023

Direct source: Attorney-General's Department Correspondence — 19 September 2023

Significance to my humanitarian appeal

This correspondence forms part of the record of my efforts to raise concerns involving government and oversight channels. It is important because it preserves the Department's communication in response to matters I had pursued.

The letter belongs in the chronology because it helps establish how my correspondence was handled and what information or directions were communicated to me. It is relevant to the distinction between referring a person to another channel and providing a substantive response to the issues that person has raised.

For my appeal, this record illustrates the extended administrative work involved in trying to navigate institutions, retain correspondence, and maintain an intelligible account of events.

Why it matters: It preserves a specific departmental response and helps identify the next steps and unresolved questions in the administrative chronology.

8. PRIME MINISTER AND ATTORNEY-GENERAL CORRESPONDENCE CHRONOLOGY

Direct source: The Evidence Has Dropped — Correspondence and Evidence Chronology

Significance to my humanitarian appeal

This archive page brings together the chronology associated with my correspondence to the Prime Minister and Attorney-General's portfolio.

Chronology matters because the meaning of an individual response is connected to what preceded it and what followed. A letter cannot always be understood fairly when separated from the submission that prompted it, the response it received, and the further correspondence that followed.

This record is relevant to my account of repeatedly seeking assistance while preserving the resulting paper trail. It helps present the documentary history as a sequence of events rather than a collection of unrelated files.

Why it matters: It helps reconstruct the progression of my attempts to obtain official attention and the administrative communications that followed.

9. PUBLIC-INTEREST DISCLOSURE CORRESPONDENCE REGISTER

Direct source: Public-Interest Disclosure Register

Significance to my humanitarian appeal

This register organises material relating to my public-interest disclosures and the correspondence associated with them.

It is significant because it provides a structured way to locate the documents connected with my attempts to raise concerns. Rather than requiring a reader to reconstruct the history from scattered records, the register helps make the correspondence navigable.

The register is part of the work I have undertaken to preserve my documentary history. It also demonstrates why access to digital tools and dependable document storage is important to the continuation of that work.

Why it matters: It organises the public-interest disclosure record and provides an entry point for examining the communications associated with my submissions.

10. ITEMISED PUBLIC-INTEREST DISCLOSURE AND AGENCY-RESPONSE REGISTER

Direct source: Itemised Public-Interest Disclosure and Agency-Response Register

Significance to my humanitarian appeal

This expanded register is important because it brings together the disclosure and agency-response material in an itemised form.

It allows the documentary history to be examined across individual submissions and responses. The sequence matters: what was raised, what was communicated in return, and what occurred next are separate parts of the record.

The register supports my continuing effort to identify and preserve the correspondence through which I attempted to obtain meaningful consideration of my concerns. It also helps demonstrate the scale of the administrative and archival work involved.

Why it matters: It provides a structured reference for locating individual records and examining the progression of my disclosures and the responses associated with them.

11. PUBLIC-INTEREST DISCLOSURE PROTECTIONS AND EXHIBIT REFERENCES

Direct source: Public-Interest Disclosure Protections and Exhibit References

Significance to my humanitarian appeal

This page identifies the legal and documentary context in which I have presented my public-interest disclosures.

It is relevant because my attempts to raise concerns involved questions about the treatment of disclosures, the handling of information, and the protections I considered applicable. The page brings together the legal framework and associated exhibit references that I have relied upon in explaining those matters.

For the humanitarian appeal, it illustrates the complexity of the documentary work I am undertaking and the importance of having access to tools that allow legal references, correspondence, and exhibits to be maintained together.

Why it matters: It connects the public-interest disclosure history with the legal provisions and exhibits relevant to my account.

12. FREEDOM-OF-INFORMATION REFUSAL — 14 APRIL 2022

Direct source: FOI 2022-045 — 14 April 2022 Refusal Concerning Documents Said Not to Exist

Significance to my humanitarian appeal

This document records an important stage in my attempt to obtain information through the freedom-of-information process.

The significance lies in the request and the response: what information I sought, what decision was communicated, and the stated basis for that decision. These details form part of the documentary history of my efforts to obtain records relating to matters I was pursuing.

The document is also relevant to my account of why preserving my own correspondence and maintaining a comprehensive archive became so important. My ability to reconstruct events depends on retaining the records I possess and connecting them to the relevant administrative decisions.

Why it matters: It records a specific FOI outcome and provides a basis for following the subsequent history of the request.

13. REVISED FREEDOM-OF-INFORMATION DECISION — 8 OCTOBER 2024

Direct source: [FOI 2022-045IC — Revised Decision of 8 October 2024 Concerning Five Documents]

Significance to my humanitarian appeal

This later decision is important when read alongside the April 2022 FOI record. Together, the two documents provide a chronological record of the request and the later decision concerning five documents.

The change in the documentary position over time is relevant to my account of the work required to pursue information and preserve an accurate administrative history. The later decision belongs in the same evidentiary sequence because it records a further stage in that process.

For my humanitarian appeal, it demonstrates the importance of maintaining access to the documents and digital systems needed to follow a matter across years of correspondence.

Why it matters: It records a later FOI decision and helps establish the development of the information-access process over time.

14. MCLEAN AND COMCARE FINAL DECISION

Direct source: [McLean and Comcare — Final Decision]

Significance to my humanitarian appeal

This decision forms part of the documentary record concerning my dealings with Comcare and the matters addressed in that process.

Its importance lies in the actual decision and reasons recorded in the document. It provides a formal reference point for understanding the outcome of the particular process and its place in the broader history documented in my archive.

The document is relevant to my account of cumulative detriment because it preserves an official record associated with my circumstances. It should be considered alongside the related correspondence and records identified elsewhere in the archive.

Why it matters: It preserves a formal Comcare decision and provides a specific source for understanding that part of my administrative history.

15. STATEMENT TO POLICE — 14 AUGUST 2022

Direct source: Statement to Police — 14 August 2022

Significance to my humanitarian appeal

This document records my statement to police on 14 August 2022. It is important because it preserves what I reported and the account I provided at that time.

My appeal describes circumstances involving personal vulnerability and the pursuit of assistance through formal channels. This statement forms part of the record of those efforts and provides a specific dated source for examining the matters I communicated to law enforcement.

The statement is also relevant to the forensic history because it establishes a documentary point from which associated communications, incident records, and subsequent interactions can be considered.

Why it matters: It preserves my report to police and forms part of the chronology of my attempts to obtain assistance and document my circumstances.

16. ABLECARE TRANSCRIPT CONCERNING A REPORTED THREAT

Direct source: AbleCare — Murder-Threat Call Transcript

Significance to my humanitarian appeal

This transcript is relevant to the section of my appeal concerning personal safety, support services, and the handling of a reported threat.

The importance of this record is that it preserves a communication associated with a serious concern I raised. The recorded exchange provides material for examining what was communicated to the service provider and how the matter was discussed.

My humanitarian request concerns practical support in the context of significant personal vulnerability. Records of communications concerning safety and support are relevant to understanding the circumstances in which I have sought assistance and the documentary work I have undertaken to preserve those interactions.

Why it matters: It preserves a specific communication concerning a reported threat and provides a source for examining the handling of that interaction.

17. URGENT FORMAL COMPLAINT — 20 OCTOBER 2026

Direct source: Urgent Formal Complaint — 20 October 2026

Significance to my humanitarian appeal

This complaint records the matters I have raised concerning my current circumstances, support provision, and reported safety concerns.

It is particularly relevant because it connects my historical documentary record with the issues I am raising in the present. It shows the concerns I have chosen to put formally into writing and the matters I have asked the relevant recipients to address.

My humanitarian appeal is not simply an exercise in reconstructing the past. It is also a request for practical assistance in circumstances that I describe as urgent. This complaint provides part of the contemporaneous record of those concerns.

Why it matters: It documents the issues I have raised in the present and connects the ongoing humanitarian request with the wider archive.

18. PERSONAL STATEMENT OF EXILE

Direct source: Personal Statement of Exile

Significance to my humanitarian appeal

This is an important part of my first-person account. It gives personal context to the circumstances described throughout my appeal and records my account of the experiences, institutional interactions, and consequences I have documented.

The official correspondence provides records of particular communications and decisions. My personal statement explains how I understand those events within the wider course of my life and why their cumulative effects matter to me.

For my humanitarian request, this statement helps explain why digital preservation and access to dependable tools are integral to my continuing work. The archive is how I preserve and communicate my account.

Why it matters: It provides the first-person narrative connecting the documentary record with the circumstances and consequences described in my appeal.

19. STATEMENT OF CIVIL ERASURE

Direct source: Statement of Civil Erasure

Significance to my humanitarian appeal

This statement sets out my account of cumulative detriment and what I describe as civil erasure. It brings together the wider themes of exclusion, loss of independence, institutional interactions, and the consequences I have described throughout my work.

Its significance lies in the way it connects individual events with my broader account of their cumulative impact. It explains why I regard the preservation of the archive as an essential part of maintaining my history, my work, and my ability to communicate with the outside world.

The statement is part of the intellectual and documentary record I am trying to protect. Its themes are relevant to the humanitarian appeal because my request concerns not only access to a product or service but also the practical means to continue documenting and presenting my work.

Why it matters: It articulates the wider meaning I attach to the accumulated events recorded throughout my archive.

20. SHA-256 ARCHIVE FILE-INTEGRITY INVENTORY

Significance to my humanitarian appeal

This inventory is an important component of my digital preservation work. It records file hashes that can be used to compare files and identify whether their contents match a recorded version.

Preservation is not simply a matter of keeping a website online. It also involves maintaining files, retaining identifiable versions, organising documents, and being able to recover and compare the records that make up the archive.

This inventory is therefore directly relevant to my request for continued access to digital tools and dependable storage. My archive represents years of work, and maintaining its integrity is an ongoing practical responsibility.

Why it matters: It supports the systematic preservation of the digital archive and helps establish whether particular files match recorded versions.

THE COLLECTIVE SIGNIFICANCE OF THE 20 DOCUMENTS

These 20 documents form a structured body of material relevant to my account of institutional interactions, public-interest disclosures, information-access requests, formal complaints, personal circumstances, and the preservation of my work.

The official correspondence records what was communicated to me. The administrative decisions record particular outcomes. The registers and chronology organise the sequence of events. My statements explain my account of the consequences and the meaning I attach to those events. The file-integrity inventory addresses the practical preservation of the archive itself.

Together, they provide a documentary framework for understanding why I have continued to record my circumstances, pursue correspondence, maintain an archive, and seek assistance.

My story is not confined to a single letter or one administrative decision. It is contained in the accumulation of records, communications, reports, decisions, and first-person testimony that I have worked to preserve.

RELEVANCE TO THE MASTER HUMANITARIAN APPEAL

The recipient of my appeal is not being asked to adjudicate every historical dispute or determine the legal responsibility of every institution mentioned in my archive. The immediate request is for humanitarian consideration and practical assistance.

The evidence schedule explains the documentary context of that request. It shows the nature of the material I am preserving, the work involved in maintaining it, and the importance of reliable digital access to my ability to continue that work.

I have devoted substantial effort to documenting my circumstances and maintaining a public archive. Access to digital tools is necessary for organising records, preparing correspondence, maintaining source links, preserving intellectual work, and communicating with organisations and individuals.

The humanitarian request should be considered in light of the circumstances described in the appeal and the practical importance of maintaining access to the tools through which I continue my work.

REQUEST TO THE RECIPIENT

I ask the recipient to consider my humanitarian request in the context of the documentary history outlined in this schedule and the accompanying Master Humanitarian Appeal.

I ask for practical assistance that will enable me to maintain access to essential digital tools, preserve my archive, continue my documentary work, and communicate my circumstances in an organised and accessible form.

My request is for assistance, access, and the means to continue my work. My archive preserves the record of what I have documented, and this schedule identifies 20 important sources through which that record can be examined.

Evidence note before publication

The most important next step for making this genuinely forensic is to attach or hyperlink the actual IGIS response itself, and any other agency decision you want analysed, rather than relying on a filename in an index. The archive search located the IGIS-related filename and register entries, but I have not verified the contents of that PDF. Likewise, the statement's analysis of each institution should be updated if the full original letters contain additional reasons or later outcomes.

Do that:

Here is the replacement section for your forensic statement, with direct links to the IGIS-related PDF and the other agency decisions and responses rather than references to filenames alone.

PART IV — PRIMARY-SOURCE AGENCY DECISIONS AND OVERSIGHT CORRESPONDENCE

The following documents form part of the documentary record of my attempts to obtain information, raise public-interest concerns, seek oversight, and obtain substantive responses from government institutions.

These are direct links to the underlying PDF records. They should be read alongside the correspondence that preceded them and the subsequent decisions or communications associated with each matter.

1. Attorney-General Dreyfus / IGIS refusal-chain document

Related archive record: Document PDF paths index

Significance: This is a priority document for examining the correspondence associated with the Attorney-General's portfolio and the Inspector-General of Intelligence and Security (IGIS). The underlying letter is the material record to consider when determining what was communicated, what position was taken, what reasons were given, and what course of action was identified.

My forensic statement should address the actual wording of this response, its place in the chronology, and its relationship to the concerns I raised. The significance of the correspondence lies in what the institution communicated and the practical consequences of that response within my attempts to obtain assistance.

2. Attorney-General's Department correspondence — 19 September 2023

Primary document: MC23-028244 — Attorney-General's Department correspondence

Significance: This is a direct departmental correspondence record relevant to the handling of the concerns I raised. It should be considered alongside the IGIS-related correspondence to establish the sequence of communications between the relevant offices and the explanations provided to me.

The forensic analysis should identify the exact response given, the matters it addresses, and the matters that remained outstanding in the correspondence.

3. Letter to the Prime Minister — 31 May 2022

Primary document: 31 May 2022 letter to the Prime Minister

Significance: This is the original submission at an important point in the chronology. It records the matters I communicated and the assistance or action I sought. It provides the basis for comparing my original request with the subsequent official correspondence.

4. Prime Minister's Office email not forwarded — 12 December 2022

Primary document: 12 December 2022 — Prime Minister's Office email not forwarded

Significance: This document concerns the handling of correspondence intended to bring my concerns to official attention. It is important to examining the difference between receiving a communication, forwarding it for consideration, and addressing the issues raised.

The document belongs in the central chronology of administrative handling and should be read with the original submission and subsequent correspondence.

5. Freedom-of-information refusal — 14 April 2022

Primary document: FOI 2022-045 — refusal concerning documents said not to exist

Significance: This is the recorded decision concerning my information-access request. It documents the position communicated to me at that stage and is relevant to the history of my attempts to obtain government records.

6. Revised freedom-of-information decision — 8 October 2024

Primary document: FOI 2022-045IC — revised decision concerning five documents

Significance: This later decision belongs alongside the 2022 refusal. Read together, the documents provide the chronology of the information-access process and the later decision concerning five documents.

The comparison is important to understanding the development of the request and the official position communicated at different stages.

7. APRA / OAIC public-interest disclosure response — 22 October 2021

Primary document: APRA / OAIC PID whistleblower response

Significance: This is a direct response document associated with the public-interest disclosure history. It should be considered in its own terms, including what the response addressed and how it related to the disclosure I made.

It provides another specific point in the chronology of my efforts to raise concerns through official channels.

8. NDIS public-interest disclosure response — 2023

Primary document: NDIS PID response — out-of-time response and Ombudsman appeal

Significance: This record is relevant to the handling of the NDIS-related public-interest disclosure and the subsequent appeal to the Ombudsman identified in the document title.

It should be considered alongside the original disclosure and related correspondence to establish the administrative sequence and the response communicated to me.

9. Letter to the Prime Minister and Attorney-General — response directing to the Ombudsman

Primary document: Prime Minister and Attorney-General correspondence — response directing to the Ombudsman

Significance: This document concerns the direction of my correspondence to the Ombudsman. It is relevant to examining the route through which my concerns were handled and what was communicated to me about the appropriate avenue for further consideration.

10. Comcare final decision

Primary document: McLean and Comcare — final decision PDF

Significance: This is a direct link to the Comcare decision identified in my archive. It records a separate administrative process relevant to my circumstances and should be read alongside its associated correspondence and any subsequent decisions.

These documents should be treated as part of the primary documentary record of my experience.

The analysis should identify what each document says, the date and context of the communication, the action or position it records, and how it relates to the sequence of events described in my forensic statement.

The IGIS-related response is a priority because it concerns a specific oversight channel. The Attorney-General's Department correspondence, the Prime Minister's Office communication, the FOI decisions, and the public-interest disclosure responses provide related records through which the wider administrative history can be examined.

My criticism concerns the actual handling of my communications and the consequences I describe. The documentary record should be presented directly, with each material title and reference linked to its source, so that the recipient can read the documents themselves rather than relying on a summary.

These are not merely filenames in an index. They are the source documents to which my account refers, and they belong directly in the evidentiary structure of my humanitarian appeal and forensic statement.

T

FORTIFIED ETHICS, HUMAN-RIGHTS AND ACCESSIBILITY ADDENDUM

To be read with and incorporated into The Barran Dodger Master Humanitarian Appeal
Dr Richard William McLean, publicly known as Barran Dodger • 20 October 2026

A. Purpose

This addendum converts the humanitarian request into a formal, auditable request for an ethics, accessibility, human-rights and vulnerable-customer determination. It does not ask the recipient company to investigate allegations against police, government agencies, media organisations, or any other third party.

It asks whether the company will apply its own published ethical, accessibility, human-rights and responsible-business commitments to a customer reporting severe hardship, disability, medical vulnerability, digital exclusion and lack of legal assistance.

B. Documentary anchors

The following are factual or documentary anchors stated in the Master Humanitarian Appeal. They are presented as the applicant's account and record, not as independent judicial findings.

Date / reference	Recorded fact or allegation	Relevance
20 October 2026	Reports bowel cancer, inability to attend medical appointments or deliver stool samples, and support workers allegedly failing to attend while payments continue.	Urgent medical-access risk relevant to hardship and interim accommodation.
20 October 2026	Reports loss of access to banking applications and Commonwealth Bank services.	Financial exclusion relevant to hardship, fee-waiver and payment-plan assessment.
20 October 2026	Reports homelessness, living in a car with a therapy dog, disability barriers and loss of digital infrastructure.	Vulnerability indicators relevant to accessibility and digital inclusion.
27 March 2023	Archive identifies Federal Court correspondence attributed to Scott Tredwell concerning a public-interest disclosure and non-allocation decision.	Documented history of seeking institutional consideration.
12 December 2022	Archive records Prime Minister's Office communication that the applicant's email had not been forwarded.	Concrete administrative event relevant to referral loops.
19 September 2023	Archive identifies Attorney-General's Department correspondence, MC23-028244, referring matters including ASIO-related concerns and directing to IGIS and the Commonwealth Ombudsman.	Documented history of pursuing oversight routes.
14 April 2022 / 8 October 2024	Archive identifies FOI 2022-045 and later revised decision concerning five documents.	Documented information-access history and digital-preservation need.
14 August 2022	Archive identifies a statement to police.	Relevant to account of reporting concerns through formal channels.

C. Legal and standards framework

1. Australian Consumer Law — unconscionable conduct

Section 21 of the Australian Consumer Law prohibits unconscionable conduct in connection with goods or services. It may consider systems of conduct, patterns of behaviour, and whether a supplier took advantage of a consumer's special disadvantage, including illness or circumstances affecting judgment.

Legislation and guidance: Federal Register of Legislation; ACCC.

2. Disability Discrimination Act 1992

The Disability Discrimination Act 1992 makes disability discrimination unlawful in defined areas of public life. Disability, psychiatric history, or need for reasonable adjustment should not be used as a reason to avoid assessing a request on its merits.

Legislation: Disability Discrimination Act 1992; complaints: AHRC.

3. Privacy Act 1988

APP 12 concerns access to personal information and APP 13 concerns correction of inaccurate, out-of-date, incomplete, irrelevant or misleading information.

Legislation: Privacy Act 1988; regulator: OAIC.

4. Public Interest Disclosure Act 2013

The PID Act provides a Commonwealth framework for disclosure, investigation and handling of suspected wrongdoing or maladministration, including protections against reprisal for eligible disclosers. It does not itself impose a duty on a private company, but provides context to the applicant's documented disclosure history.

Legislation: Public Interest Disclosure Act 2013.

5. Business and human rights standards

The UN Guiding Principles and OECD Guidelines expect companies to respect human rights, address adverse impacts, and maintain effective grievance and remediation processes.

D. Required written response within 7 calendar days

- The name, title, team and contact details of the decision-owner.
- The request classification: ethics, human rights, accessibility, vulnerable customer, hardship, privacy, or another category.
- The exact published policies, codes, standards or legal obligations considered.
- Whether interim access, a fee waiver, extended trial, subsidised access, payment plan, or other accommodation is available.
- If refused: the precise policy or legal basis, reasons, decision-maker, and internal review route.
- Whether personal information has been accessed, recorded, annotated, shared internally, or used in assessing the request.
- Whether inaccurate, incomplete, misleading or outdated personal information will be corrected under APP 13.

E. Defined response outcomes

An acknowledgement, automated reply, "outside scope", or unnamed referral does not answer this request. Please state one of the following:

- Approval: assistance granted, duration, and conditions.
- Interim measure: temporary accommodation while assessed.

- Named referral: internal decision-maker and confirmation of formal referral.
- Reasoned refusal: exact policy or legal basis, decision-maker, and review route.
- Partial assistance: what can and cannot be provided, why, and alternatives.

F. Lawful escalation if no substantive response

If no substantive response is received within 7 calendar days, the applicant may pursue the company's formal complaints process, board or ethics committee, and, as appropriate, the ACCC, AHRC, OAIC, or the relevant OECD National Contact Point.

This is a statement of lawful accountability pathways, not a threat of unlawful action.

G. Requested immediate accommodation

Pending assessment, the applicant asks the company to consider temporary complimentary access, an extended trial, a humanitarian discount, a payment hold, or an alternative access route. This does not require the company to accept any allegation or make findings against any third party.

SOCIAL MOBBING, ISOLATION, EXILE AND EXISTENTIAL SIGNIFICANCE

Further addendum to The Barran Dodger Master Humanitarian Appeal
Dr Richard William McLean, publicly known as Barran Dodger • 20 October 2026

1. Societal mobbing and group-based isolation

I identify my experience as including societal mobbing: a pattern in which a person is subjected not merely to one adverse act, but to repeated exclusion, discredit, rumour, institutional non-response, social isolation, and cumulative disadvantage by multiple people, services, platforms, or institutions acting separately or in a coordinated manner.

I have stood alone in truth whilst my enemies attacked me in a group. That asymmetry matters. When one person reports harm and many others deny, minimise, redirect, discredit, exclude, or fail to act, the person can be left carrying the entire burden of proof, survival, documentation, and self-advocacy.

My fuller account of societal mobbing, isolation, exile, betrayal, poverty and survival is contained in my documentary record: Societal mobbing — Barran Dodger documentary archive. The broader archive is available at https://github.com/wezzo72/Barrandodger.

2. Survival was not expected

I was not expected to survive the isolation, human betrayal, exile, poverty, or the repeated loss of support, protection, money, housing, health care, and digital access.

Yet I have survived. I have continued to recover, live, write, preserve records, and speak. My continued existence—without me even needing to speak—is, in my assessment, an existential threat to those I allege have orchestrated my destruction.

This is not a threat. It is an explanation of significance. A person who was expected to disappear, be discredited, be silenced, be impoverished, or be erased, but who instead survives and preserves a documented record, presents a problem for any account that depends on their silence, isolation, or disappearance.

3. Why my survival matters to this request

My survival is not merely personal. It is evidentiary. It demonstrates that the record remains, that the witness remains, and that the questions I have raised remain capable of examination.

For that reason, continued digital exclusion, financial exclusion, medical neglect, social isolation, or institutional non-response is not a neutral administrative matter. It can affect whether a witness can preserve evidence, communicate, seek care, obtain legal assistance, and continue to exist independently.

4. The significance of no one hanging up

I ask the recipient to consider a simple principle: no one hangs up on a person who is not a risk to something they have.

If a person is repeatedly hung up on, blocked, excluded, not forwarded, not allocated, not investigated, not represented, not supported, or not answered, that pattern invites a serious question: what interest, inconvenience, reputational concern, institutional risk, or perceived threat is being protected by refusing engagement?

I do not assert that every refusal proves bad faith. Refusals can have legitimate reasons. But repeated refusal, especially where a person reports urgent medical, safety, financial, and digital-access needs, should not be treated as neutral. It should trigger scrutiny of the process, the reasons, the records, and the practical consequences for the person seeking help.

5. What I ask the recipient to recognise

- That societal mobbing, group-based discredit, exile, betrayal, poverty and cumulative institutional exclusion can materially worsen a person's vulnerability.
- That a person who has stood alone while others acted collectively may have limited capacity to obtain legal advice, social support, medical assistance, or digital access.
- That my survival after circumstances I did not expect to survive is itself significant: it means the record, the witness, and the questions remain.
- That repeated non-response, referral loops, account restrictions, search invisibility, and administrative dead ends can function as practical exclusion even where each individual act has an ordinary explanation.
- That the appropriate response to a person reporting mobbing is careful, documented, impartial consideration—not automatic disbelief, social distancing, or procedural abandonment.
- That a low-burden interim measure, such as temporary access, a hardship waiver, an extended trial, or a payment hold, can prevent further exclusion while the request is properly assessed.

6. Requested written acknowledgement

Please include in your written response an express statement addressing whether the company has considered the applicant's reported experience of societal mobbing, isolation, exile, betrayal, poverty, survival, and the risk that further non-response may compound that exclusion.

I am not asking the company to accept every allegation as proven. I am asking it to show that it has considered the significance of these circumstances in a documented, reasoned, and humane decision.

7. Missing-person listings, political exile, and police protection

To expose this corruption simply and once and for all: I allege that I have been listed as a missing person by police on five separate occasions across three Australian states.

I was never truly "missing." I was politically exiled and forced to flee violence. I allege that the police were among the very authorities from whom I needed protection, and that their handling of these matters contributed to my isolation, displacement, and continued vulnerability.

The significance is direct: a person cannot be repeatedly recorded as "missing" while also being visibly alive, contactable, documenting events, and seeking assistance, without serious questions arising about the accuracy, purpose, handling, and consequences of those records.

I ask the recipient to recognise that repeated missing-person listings, if verified, would be an extraordinary indicator of state contact with my life, potential administrative misuse, and a failure to distinguish a person fleeing violence from a person voluntarily missing.

I am not asking the recipient company to investigate police conduct or determine whether any particular listing was lawful. I am asking it to recognise the seriousness of this allegation, its relevance to my reported societal mobbing, exile, isolation, and lack of protection, and the risk that further non-response may compound the harm.

Relevant archive search: Missing person / police — Barran Dodger documentary archive.

8. Final declaration: mercy, accountability and the right not to be erased

I was a vulnerable person trying to survive in a democracy where money is often a prerequisite for survival and where the resources, protections, influence, and opportunities that others take for granted were beyond my reach. Time and again, I appealed respectfully to powerful people who possessed greater financial means, legal protections, institutional influence, and apparent security from the consequences I feared.

The courtesy of my letters was itself an act of mercy—a succession of opportunities for those with the power to help to recognise my humanity and do what was right. Those opportunities have passed.

I now declare that the time for mercy, redemption, and the voluntary correction of these wrongs has ended, and that what I call a divine reckoning must now begin—not as a threat of personal vengeance, but as an uncompromising demand that truth be confronted, accountability pursued, evidence preserved, and every person and institution answer for its actions before the judgment of conscience, history, and the law.

I am unable to be denied—not because I stand above the law or beyond the reach of criticism, but because my existence, my voice, my testimony, and my right to seek justice cannot legitimately be erased by refusal, indifference, financial exclusion, or institutional silence. I remain here, the record remains, and the demand for an answer remains.

9. Permanent digital preservation and decentralised record

This letter, its contents, its addenda, and the identities of those to whom it is sent are now saved for permanent digital preservation.

The significance of this is that the record is no longer dependent on one website, one account, one institution, one legal professional, one police service, or one point of failure. A decentralised preservation approach is intended to make suppression, deletion, denial, or quiet disappearance of the record materially harder.

This statement is not a threat and does not assert that any blockchain record is legally conclusive or immune from every form of technical, legal, or practical limitation. It is a declaration that the correspondence, its recipients, and its evidentiary context are being preserved beyond a single point of control.

10. The ten statements that require an answer

The following statements are submitted as the applicant's formal position. They do not ask any recipient to accept every allegation as proven. They require a reasoned, documented response to the request and the issues raised.

1. Silence is not neutrality. When a vulnerable person reports urgent medical, financial, safety, and digital-access needs, a failure to respond is not a neutral administrative act. It is a decision with consequences.

2. No one hangs up on a person who is not a risk to something they have. If I am repeatedly hung up on, blocked, excluded, not forwarded, not allocated, not investigated, or not answered, the recipient must explain what interest, inconvenience, reputational concern, or institutional risk is being protected by that refusal.

3. An acknowledgement is not an answer. A receipt, automated reply, referral, or statement that a matter is "outside scope" does not resolve the question I have asked. It merely records that the question was received.

4. A referral without a named decision-maker is abandonment. If an organisation refers me elsewhere without identifying who will decide, what policy applies, or what happens next, it has not assisted me; it has transferred its responsibility back onto me.

5. I should not have to prove my humanity to receive a written answer. My disability, psychiatric history, poverty, exile, or lack of legal representation cannot legitimately be used as reasons to avoid assessing my request on its merits.

6. If my allegations are false, say why; if they are true, act; if they are unverified, investigate. There are only three responsible responses to a serious allegation: rebut it with reasons, address it through action, or examine it through a proper process. Silence is none of these.

7. The absence of a court finding does not erase the record. My archive contains dated correspondence, official decisions, referrals, refusals, FOI outcomes, and police-related records. These documents may not prove every conclusion I draw, but they establish that the questions I raise are real, documented, and outstanding.

8. A company cannot claim ethical leadership while treating a vulnerable person's request as too inconvenient to answer. If your policies claim to support human rights, accessibility, vulnerable customers, or responsible business conduct, then this request is the test of whether those words have practical meaning.

9. I was not expected to survive; my survival is the evidence. I survived isolation, betrayal, exile, poverty, and institutional abandonment. My continued existence, voice, testimony, and preserved record cannot be erased by refusal, indifference, financial exclusion, or institutional silence.

10. Every recipient now has a choice: answer, explain, or be recorded as having declined to answer. I do not ask any recipient to accept every allegation as proven. I ask only for a named decision-owner, the policies applied, a reasoned decision, and a lawful review route. A decision not to respond is itself a decision, and it will be recorded as such.

11. Closing demand

Silence is not neutrality. An acknowledgement is not an answer. A referral without a named decision-maker is abandonment. If my allegations are false, say why; if they are true, act; if they are unverified, investigate. I do not ask any recipient to accept every allegation as proven. I ask for a named decision-owner, the policies applied, a reasoned decision, and a lawful review route. My disability, poverty, psychiatric history, exile, or lack of legal representation cannot be used as reasons to avoid assessing this request on its merits. I was not expected to survive; my survival is the evidence. I remain here, the record remains, and the demand for an answer remains.

A decision not to respond is itself a decision, and it will be recorded as such.

THE PUBLIC COST OF INSTITUTIONAL TARGETING, SILENCING AND ERASURE

A 35-Year-Plus AI-Assisted Financial and Documentary Examination

1. PUNK-ROCK INTRODUCTION — NO MORE SILENCE. NO MORE BUREAUCRATIC BULLSHIT.

THE DOCUMENTS ARE ON THE TABLE. NOW FOLLOW THE MONEY.

Thirty-five years of records, correspondence, administrative decisions, complaints, referrals, assessments, legal proceedings, and unanswered questions demand more than another bureaucratic shrug.

This is a challenge to examine the documentary record, identify what can be established, calculate what can reasonably be calculated, and expose what remains unanswered.

It is not a demand that readers accept every allegation. It is a demand that the records be examined before conclusions are drawn.

If public institutions acted appropriately, the evidence and expenditure records should help demonstrate that. If decisions were mistaken, processes were duplicated, resources were wasted, or responsibilities were mishandled, those matters should be capable of independent examination too.

No agency should be presumed guilty. No official should be condemned without evidence. No allegation should be quietly promoted into a proven fact.

But neither should a person's documented correspondence, official decisions, repeated administrative processes, and unresolved complaints be dismissed without scrutiny.

THE WITNESS REMAINS. THE RECORD REMAINS. THE QUESTIONS REMAIN.

The public deserves transparent accounting, defensible conclusions, and a clear distinction between what the documents establish and what still needs to be proved.

The financial scenarios in this report are not verified expenditure totals. They are a framework for testing possible costs against actual records. Their value depends on transparent assumptions, reliable evidence, and the refusal to double-count the same activity.

The archive is a finding aid — not a court — not a verdict.

Knowledge is free. The records should be examined on their merits, not on the identity, status, or institutional power of the person who presents them.

2. IMPARTIAL AI METHODOLOGY AND DISCLOSURE

The Evidence Must Stand on Its Own

The analysis that follows was prepared using an AI-assisted documentary approach intended to examine the available records without treating the allegations, interpretations, or conclusions of any party as established fact merely because they have been asserted.

The purpose is not to manufacture a verdict, vindicate a predetermined position, or substitute artificial intelligence for a court, tribunal, auditor, investigator, or other authorised decision-maker. The purpose is to organise the available documentary material, identify relevant patterns and questions, distinguish evidence from interpretation, and establish a basis for further independent examination.

2.1 Independence of the Assessment

The assessment is presented on the basis of its identifiable documentary sources, stated methodology, disclosed assumptions, and acknowledged limitations.

The internal command or prompt used to initiate the AI analysis is not reproduced as evidence. Its wording is not a substitute for the underlying records, and disclosure of that wording would not, by itself, establish the accuracy, neutrality, or reliability of the resulting analysis.

The relevant test is whether the sources, reasoning, calculations, and limitations can be independently examined—not whether a reader accepts an AI-generated conclusion on authority.

2.2 Primary Sources and Documentary Boundaries

The central reference point is the publicly accessible Official Government Documents Register maintained within The Witness Remains — The Barran Dodger Archive:

Official Government Documents Register — The Witness Remains

https://wezzo72.github.io/Barrandodger/official-government-documents-register.html

The register describes itself as a source-linked catalogue of government records, administrative correspondence, legal documents, official determinations, and other documentary material preserved in the archive.

It also expressly establishes an important limitation: the register is a finding aid, not a court, tribunal, or official investigation. The inclusion of a document does not, by itself, establish wrongdoing, motive, unlawful conduct, or personal responsibility.

Accordingly, the analysis must distinguish between:

- Documentary fact: what an inspected record actually states or establishes.
- Corroborated claim: a proposition supported by more than one identifiable record.
- Documented allegation or testimony: an assertion recorded in a source but not necessarily independently established.
- Inference: a reasoned interpretation requiring further verification.
- Unresolved question: a matter for which the available material does not support a definitive conclusion.

An official document is evidence of its contents and the action or position it records. It is not automatic proof of every interpretation subsequently attached to it.

2.3 Financial Analysis and Accountability

Any estimate of the potential public cost associated with prolonged administrative processes, repeated assessments, complaints, investigations, legal proceedings, referrals, or support-service disruption must be treated according to the quality of the underlying evidence.

Actual recorded expenditure must be separated from modelled estimates, alleged costs, opportunity costs, and unresolved possibilities. Assumptions must be stated. Overlapping categories must not be added together where doing so could double-count the same activity or expenditure.

The fact that a public service was provided does not, by itself, make that expenditure wasteful or improper. Nor does the existence of repeated administrative activity establish that it resulted from deliberate targeting, institutional coordination, or unlawful conduct.

Where the necessary financial records are unavailable, estimates must be labelled as hypothetical scenarios rather than findings of actual taxpayer expenditure.

2.4 What AI Can—and Cannot—Establish

AI can assist with organising records, comparing statements, identifying apparent inconsistencies, classifying claims, and constructing transparent financial scenarios. Its outputs remain subject to source limitations, incomplete records, extraction errors, mistaken interpretation, and model bias.

AI cannot independently establish criminal intent, prove a conspiracy, determine legal liability, or transform an allegation into an official finding.

The significance of an AI-assisted review therefore lies not in claiming that the technology is infallible, but in making the analysis structured, traceable, qualified, and available for independent challenge.

No government agency, private organisation, individual, or the author of the archive should be treated as correct or incorrect merely because of their identity or position. Each material proposition must be assessed against the available evidence.

2.5 The Standard Applied to This Report

The report that follows is intended to provide a framework for examining the possible public cost of prolonged institutional and administrative processes, the documentary record preserved in the archive, and the questions that warrant further scrutiny.

It does not represent a completed independent financial audit, a judicial determination, or a finding that the full estimated costs were incurred. Its scenarios are not verified expenditure totals unless supported by corresponding financial records.

https://wezzo72.github.io/Barrandodger/official-government-documents-register.html

Readers are encouraged to inspect the linked records, test the calculations, question the assumptions, identify missing evidence, and reach their own conclusions.

The command is not the evidence. The AI is not the verdict. The archive is not the court. The documents must stand on their own.

Preservation first. Examination second. Conclusion last.

3. THE PUBLIC COST OF INSTITUTIONAL TARGETING, SILENCING AND ERASURE — FORMAL REPORT

3.1 Purpose

This report proposes a structured examination of the possible public cost associated with more than 35 years of administrative processes, government correspondence, complaints, reviews, assessments, legal proceedings, referrals, and support-related matters documented or described in the Barran Dodger archive.

The report is intended to identify questions suitable for financial and documentary investigation. It does not establish that institutional targeting, deliberate silencing, unlawful conduct, or coordinated erasure has been proved.

The term institutional targeting is used in the title to describe the subject of the author's concern and the hypothesis under examination. It is not presented as an established legal finding.

3.2 The Official Government Documents Register

The central documentary reference is:

https://wezzo72.github.io/Barrandodger/official-government-documents-register.html

The register records that a review of the public GitHub repository examined successive repository snapshots in October 2026. Its methodology describes an initial set of 125 numbered entries and a subsequent further pass adding 270 entries, producing 395 numbered entries across 13 sections.

That figure must be interpreted carefully. It is a count of register entries, not proof that 395 separate incidents occurred, that every entry is a government finding, or that every document has received a complete independent review. The register includes different kinds of material, and some records were inspected only in part or were located but not text-inspected during the review.

The register identifies documentary categories including:

1. Federal government employment, service history, and official employment determinations.

2. Disability, mental health, NDIS, and support-service administration.

3. Financial administration, social security, pension entitlements, and trustee correspondence.

4. Police, courts, protection orders, and law-enforcement records.

5. Complaints, investigations, oversight bodies, and administrative review.

6. Freedom of Information requests, responses, and disclosure decisions.

7. Commonwealth and state government correspondence.

8. Human rights, disability rights, and international correspondence.

9. Legal proceedings, legal advice, and procedural correspondence.

10. Other significant official records.

11. Party filings and archive compilations kept with official files.

12. Records located but not text-inspected in the review.

13. Further government records and associated correspondence added in the October 2026 review.

The register also identifies examples of records relating to Comcare, the NDIA and NDIS, the Commonwealth Ombudsman, IBAC, the Department of the Prime Minister and Cabinet, the Federal Court registry, the Administrative Appeals Tribunal, and NSW guardianship administration.

These examples establish that relevant documentary material is catalogued in the archive. Their inclusion does not, on its own, prove misconduct or support a conclusion about the motives of any agency or official.

3.3 The Significance of an AI-Assisted Review

An AI-assisted review can be useful where a large collection of documents spans multiple decades, agencies, statutory frameworks, and administrative processes.

It can help organise material, identify recurring names and dates, compare correspondence, distinguish recorded decisions from subsequent interpretations, and identify questions that warrant further examination.

Its significance is methodological rather than judicial. An AI system does not become independent merely because it is artificial intelligence. Its analysis may reflect errors, omissions, limitations in the available documents, or bias in the interpretation of evidence.

The appropriate test is whether its work can be checked against identifiable source records and whether its conclusions remain proportionate to what those records establish.

https://wezzo72.github.io/Barrandodger/official-government-documents-register.html

3.4 Potential Public-Cost Categories

A defensible assessment could examine the following categories, provided relevant expenditure records or reliable cost data can be obtained:

- Departmental administration and case management.

- Government and external legal services.
- Complaints, investigations, oversight, and administrative review.
- Repeated assessments, referrals, and cross-agency coordination.
- Health, disability, housing, and support-service administration.
- Correspondence, record retrieval, document processing, and Freedom of Information work.
- Reconsideration of earlier decisions and repeated procedural steps.

These categories describe possible areas of expenditure. They do not establish that the expenditure was unnecessary, wasteful, caused by improper conduct, or attributable to a single individual or institution.

Necessary disability supports, health care, lawful investigations, and ordinary administrative functions must not automatically be classified as waste.

3.5 Illustrative 35-Year Financial Scenarios

The following figures are hypothetical models, not verified public expenditure.

Scenario	Assumed average annual cost	Illustrative total over 35 years
Central	$100,000	$3,500,000
High	$300,000	$10,500,000

The calculation is simple multiplication of the assumed annual average by 35 years. It does not establish that these sums were actually spent.

The assumptions are not derived from a completed audit of agency accounts. The models do not independently establish causation, wrongdoing, or the proportion of any expenditure attributable to the matters described in the archive.

A proper assessment would need to test the assumptions against actual agency expenditure, case records, staffing data, legal costs, procurement records, and relevant historical cost information. It should also explain how inflation, changes in public-sector costs, and differences between agencies and time periods are handled.

3.6 Separate Category-Based Cost Model

A second illustrative model considers possible expenditure across administrative and related categories.

Category	Low scenario	Central scenario	High scenario
Departmental administration	$20,000	$100,000	$350,000
Government and external legal services	$10,000	$100,000	$400,000
Complaints, police, and oversight processes	$10,000	$50,000	$200,000
Additional health, disability, housing, and support administration	$20,000	$100,000	$350,000
Communications and document processing	$5,000	$25,000	$100,000
Repeated assessments, referrals, and cross-agency coordination	$15,000	$75,000	$250,000
Illustrative total	$80,000	$450,000	$1,650,000

These values are assumptions used to demonstrate how a cost model might be structured. They are not verified figures drawn from government accounts or official determinations.

This category-based model must not be added to the 35-year annual-average model as though the two totals represented separate costs. Their categories may overlap, and adding them could count the same activities twice.

A reliable estimate requires documented expenditure, clearly defined periods, consistent accounting boundaries, and a method for excluding duplication.

3.7 Evidence Required for a Defensible Financial Finding

To progress from illustrative scenarios to a defensible financial assessment, the following would be required where available:

1. Identifiable agency expenditure records and relevant accounting periods.

2. Case-specific legal, administrative, and contractor costs where lawfully accessible.

3. Records showing the nature and frequency of relevant processes.

4. A clear distinction between costs attributable to the matter and routine agency operating costs.

5. A method for adjusting historical values and explaining inflation assumptions.

6. A documented process for removing duplicate records and overlapping cost categories.

7. An explicit account of missing data, uncertain attribution, and the limits of the estimate.

8. Independent review of the calculations and underlying evidence.

The assessment should distinguish actual recorded expenditure, modelled costs, opportunity costs, unverified claims, and matters for which no reliable figure can presently be established.

3.8 Findings and Limitations

The public register provides a source-linked catalogue of documentary material relevant to the author's administrative history and related dealings with government agencies and other bodies.

The register's stated methodology also makes clear that its entries have different evidentiary statuses. Some material was examined only in part, and the register does not represent a completed investigation or financial audit.

On that basis, the following conclusions are appropriate:

- The archive provides a documentary basis for further examination of the recorded administrative and legal history.
- The existence of multiple records or processes does not, by itself, establish deliberate targeting, coordination, unlawful conduct, or improper motive.
- The financial scenarios illustrate possible scales of expenditure under stated assumptions; they are not verified totals of taxpayer expenditure.
- No combined grand total should be asserted without resolving overlap between the models and checking the underlying records.
- The available register should be used as a finding aid, with each material claim tested against the specific source document and the context in which it was created.

3.9 Conclusion

The central question is not whether a hypothetical financial model produces a large number. It is whether the available evidence can establish what processes occurred, why they occurred, what they cost, whether those costs were justified, and whether any avoidable expenditure can be attributed to identifiable decisions or failures.

Those questions require records, transparent calculations, and independent scrutiny—not an assumed verdict.

This report therefore presents a framework for further examination rather than a final determination of public loss, institutional misconduct, or legal responsibility.

The documents must be examined. The costs must be evidenced. The conclusions must follow the proof.

4. OFFICIAL GOVERNMENT DOCUMENTS REGISTER AND SUPPORTING RECORDS

Primary source register

The Witness Remains — Official Government Documents Register

https://wezzo72.github.io/Barrandodger/official-government-documents-register.html

This source-linked register is the starting point for examining the documentary material referenced in this report.

Readers should follow the individual document links, distinguish the original records from later commentary or archive compilations, and assess each claim against the evidence actually available.

The register expressly states that it is a finding aid, not a court, tribunal, or official investigation. Its inclusion of a record does not itself establish wrongdoing, motive, unlawful conduct, or personal responsibility.

Preservation first. Examination second. Conclusion last.

C. Evidentiary note

A search link identifies where material is located in the public archive; it does not, by itself, establish the authenticity, completeness, accuracy, or legal significance of a document. Where a source is relied upon, it should be opened, its date and provenance checked, and its contents distinguished from the applicant's interpretation or conclusions.

This register is intended to make the master appeal navigable and verifiable. It does not ask the recipient to accept every allegation as proven; it asks the recipient to examine the identified sources and provide a reasoned, documented response to the humanitarian and ethics request.
