

Manifesto - The Impossible Love of Barran Dodger, Circa 2022

A Community Service Announcement from the Apex of Love

Are you gagging on my big black gay cut, turgid, meaty girth — my epic appendage of a cock?

Perhaps that is the question nobody expected the prophet, philosopher, writer, musician, human-rights campaigner and chronicler of institutional failure to ask.

But perhaps that is precisely the point.

This is a community service announcement from the apex of supreme love and the Trust Fund at W.WW.BarranDodger.com.au: an attempt to transform the currency and sin of money, when void of spirit, into meaningful experiences embodying love, meaning, connection and happiness for the most downtrodden, marginalised, neglected, differently abled and abused.

The proposition is simple: what if money could become mercy?

What if power could become compassion?

What if those who have caused harm — consciously or unconsciously, intentionally or unintentionally — were given an opportunity to acknowledge it, make amends and find release?

I love all of you.

Even those whose actions I believe have harmed me.

Indeed, in the theological and allegorical language of this manifesto, I even designed your sin.

Good news has arrived: a divinely imagined return to impossible love.

So go easy on yourself.

Everything is going to be alright.

The Unlikely Saviour

The unlikely saviour is, paradoxically, a chronically disabled, fearless advocate, human-rights campaigner, doctor of philosophy, writer, philosopher, musician, self-described sage and mystic, truth-speaker and seeker.

He is also unapologetically gay and sexually expressive.

He describes himself as a sexual shaman and an architect of kundalini — a deliberately provocative embodiment of the proposition that sexuality, spirituality, humour, vulnerability and human dignity need not be enemies.

Beneath the provocation is a more serious claim:

I intend no harm.

My commitment is to nonviolence, compassion, peace, understanding and forgiveness.

The resilience itself has become part of the testimony.

I have survived what I understand to have been extraordinary and devastating experiences. I believe my life has been repeatedly placed in circumstances of abandonment, exclusion and danger, while I have nevertheless continued advocating for people who are marginalised and vulnerable.

I interpret that survival spiritually.

Others may interpret it differently.

The evidence belongs in the archive.

The meaning belongs partly to the person who lived it.

The People Who May Yet Aton

I have named people and institutions whom I believe have harmed me or failed me. Those allegations should be examined against documentary evidence rather than accepted merely because I make them.

Among the names and categories appearing in my testimony are:

Ray Griggs.

Mark Dreyfus.

Steve Iasonidis.

Tim Gos.

Liz Lindsberg.

The NDIS and its ministers and officials.

Police.

Lawyers.

Politicians.

Public officials.

My estranged mother.

This is not a declaration that every allegation has been legally established.

It is an invitation to accountability.

If you believe you have caused harm, acknowledge it.

If you made a mistake, say so.

If you participated in something wrong, explain it.

If you were afraid, admit that.

If you exercised power without sufficiently considering the human being affected by your decision, recognise that human being.

And if you believe you did nothing wrong, then say that too — openly, specifically and with reasons.

I am yearning to forgive.

A Human Being Meant for Life

Barran Dodger is a human being meant for life on Earth.

Tragically, Barran describes himself as having become homeless, socially excommunicated, estranged from family and treated by government systems as though he were a non-entity.

That experience stands in stark contrast to the merit he believes he earned through a lifetime of serving humanity.

He believes he has a rightful place on this planet.

He interprets his survival from an extraordinary medical and personal crisis through a biblical framework: death, abandonment, crucifixion, forsakenness, resurrection and return.

Whether that interpretation is accepted as theology, metaphor, psychology or personal testimony, it is central to understanding his worldview.

He describes himself as a survivor who has continued living despite circumstances he experienced as overwhelmingly hostile.

As a chronically disabled gay man, he identifies with the archetype of the scapegoat: the person upon whom blame is placed while institutions and communities avoid confronting their own failures.

He seeks refuge from what he describes as neglect, poverty, financial abuse, corruption, institutional failure and persecution within the democratic country of which he is a citizen.

And despite everything, he continues.

That continuation is itself the testimony.

The Biblical Allegory

At the heart of this manifesto is a deliberately enormous proposition:

What if the rejected person becomes the person through whom forgiveness becomes possible?

Barran understands his experience through the archetypes of the prophet, the preacher, the persecuted, the crucified and the resurrected.

The purpose is not necessarily to claim literal equivalence with Christ.

Rather, the biblical narrative becomes a framework through which suffering can be interpreted.

Forsakenness becomes an invitation to compassion.

Persecution becomes an opportunity for truth.

Resurrection becomes survival.

Judgment becomes accountability.

And forgiveness becomes freedom.

Barran now believes that he embodies aspects of Christ's principles: compassion for enemies, forgiveness of those who cause harm, resistance to violence and an insistence that human beings remain capable of redemption.

The extraordinary claim is therefore not simply:

"I was wronged."

It is:

"Even those whom I believe wronged me remain human beings capable of being forgiven."

The Alleged Architecture of Harm

I believe that jealousy, greed, power, stigma and institutional self-protection can cause enormous harm.

I believe my own experiences demonstrate circumstances that deserve independent examination.

I believe that some public decisions affecting me have been inconsistent, contradictory or profoundly detrimental.

I believe that systems involving government, law enforcement, mental health, disability services and legal assistance have sometimes failed to hear what I was trying to communicate.

Those are allegations and conclusions arising from my experience and documentary record.

They should be tested against the evidence.

That is precisely why the archive matters.

The archive is not a substitute for a court.

It is not a substitute for an independent investigation.

It is a record through which questions can be asked.

To Those Who Hold Power

To government ministers and public officials:

You possess offices that carry enormous authority.

You have homes.

You have food.

You have medicine.

You have institutional support.

You have lawyers, advisers, departments and systems capable of responding to you.

I have experienced periods in which I have had none of those things.

That asymmetry matters.

When a person already experiencing profound disadvantage encounters another institutional refusal, the consequence is not merely administrative.

It can become existential.

That is why I ask for acknowledgment rather than silence.

I ask for reasons rather than dismissal.

I ask for evidence rather than labels.

And I ask for accountability rather than revenge.

Ray Griggs

Ray Griggs, in my account, represents the power of government confronted with a vulnerable individual seeking recognition.

My criticism is not simply personal.

It concerns what I believe happened when I attempted to raise serious allegations and obtain meaningful assistance.

I ask the relevant decision-makers to examine the documentary record and explain their decisions.

If I am wrong, demonstrate why.

If I am right, acknowledge it.

That is accountability.

Steve Iasonidis

I have also made serious allegations concerning Steve Iasonidis and the circumstances surrounding my relationship and experiences with him.

Those allegations should be treated as allegations unless independently established.

What matters is that I experienced profound betrayal and believe that institutional narratives surrounding me failed to account adequately for what I was experiencing.

I do not seek violence.

I seek recognition.

To Every Lawyer

My anger at the legal profession is immense.

I have experienced the legal system as something that has repeatedly placed barriers between me and justice.

But even here, the manifesto ultimately asks for something more difficult than hatred:

prove me wrong.

Show me that the system can work.

Show me that someone without money can obtain meaningful representation.

Show me that a disabled person can challenge an institution without becoming institutionally invisible.

Show me that legal rights are meaningful when the person exercising them has no resources.

I have accused the legal profession collectively of corruption and immorality.

Those are sweeping allegations, not established facts about every individual lawyer.

The better challenge is therefore this:

If the system is just, demonstrate its justice.

To Bill Shorten and the NDIS

I have raised serious allegations concerning the NDIS, government decision-making, police involvement, intervention orders, mental-health systems and my displacement from Victoria.

I believe these events have contributed to my experience of being excluded from my former home and society.

I have described myself as a displaced political prisoner and targeted individual.

Those descriptions express my understanding of what happened to me; they require independent evidence and assessment before they can be treated as established findings.

My request remains fundamentally human:

Hear me.

If I have misunderstood something, explain it.

If I have been harmed, acknowledge it.

If officials acted properly, provide the reasons and records supporting that conclusion.

If something went wrong, repair it.

Anthony Albanese

Anthony Albanese, I previously communicated what I considered to be an extensive account of corruption, financial victimisation and interference with justice.

I received a response through the machinery of government.

It was courteous.

It was formal.

It was, from my perspective, ultimately inadequate.

That distinction matters.

Courtesy is not the same thing as justice.

A letter can be beautifully written and still leave a person homeless.

A response can be polite and still fail to answer the fundamental question.

So, Anthony Albanese:

Come down from the machinery of office for a moment.

Meet the human being behind the correspondence.

Look at the evidence.

Tell me what you believe happened.

And if I have been harmed, acknowledge it.

I am ready to forgive.

The Kiss of Reconciliation

The deliberately outrageous sexual language in this manifesto is part satire, part provocation and part reclamation.

It takes the shame historically imposed upon gay sexuality and throws it back into the public square.

The cock becomes comic.

The body becomes political.

The sexual becomes spiritual.

The supposedly shameful becomes an instrument of defiance.

But beneath all the obscenity is a surprisingly gentle message:

I want connection.

I want friendship.

I want intimacy.

I want laughter.

I want people to stop treating difference as a reason to exclude one another.

I want the lonely person to have somewhere to belong.

I want the disabled person to have somewhere safe to live.

I want the gay person to be able to exist without shame.

I want the person who has made terrible mistakes to discover that accountability does not have to mean eternal damnation.

And I want the person who believes they have been my enemy to understand that forgiveness remains possible.

The Offer of Atonement

This is ultimately an invitation.

Not to surrender.

Not to humiliation.

Not to violence.

Not to revenge.

To atonement.

If you harmed me, acknowledge it.

If you failed me, acknowledge it.

If you participated in an institutional failure, explain it.

If you believe the allegation is false, provide your evidence.

If you made a mistake, apologise.

And if an apology is deserved, I am prepared to accept it.

Because forgiveness is not weakness.

Forgiveness is the refusal to allow another person's wrongdoing to become the permanent definition of your life.

The Young, Gay, Beautiful and Ridiculous

And then there is the completely irreverent Barran.

The gay man who would happily meet another consenting adult, have a drink, laugh, flirt, dance, explore sexuality and celebrate the ridiculousness of being alive.

No violence.

No coercion.

No shame.

Only consenting adults, connection, humour, sexuality and the extraordinary possibility that two imperfect human beings might enjoy one another's company.

Even here, the underlying wish is surprisingly ordinary:

Have somewhere to belong.

Have a home.

Have a bed.

Have somewhere to laugh.

Have people who want you there.

Have a life.

The Final Message

I believe I have been betrayed by humanity.

But I also believe I have been protected by something greater than humanity.

Call that God.

Call it resilience.

Call it coincidence.

Call it survival.

Call it psychology.

Call it faith.

I call it resonance.

The purpose of this manifesto is not ultimately to declare myself superior to every person who has hurt me.

It is to declare that I remain human despite what I believe has been done to me.

I remain capable of love.

I remain capable of compassion.

I remain capable of forgiveness.

And I remain capable of imagining a world better than the one that wounded me.

To those whom I believe have persecuted, betrayed, neglected, abandoned or misunderstood me:

Come forth.

Tell the truth.

Tell your side.

Bring your evidence.

Acknowledge what you can acknowledge.

Defend what you believe must be defended.

And where harm occurred, make amends.

I do not want your destruction.

I want your humanity.

I do not want your suffering.

I want your repentance.

I do not want revenge.

I want reconciliation.

Because perhaps the greatest victory over those who hurt us is not destroying them.

Perhaps it is becoming incapable of hatred.

Fear not, my sons and daughters.

You are imperfect mortals.

So am I.

And that is precisely why forgiveness remains possible.

*Come forth.

I am ready to forgive you.

I
