

They Copied My Whole Blueprint. Registered 350 Businesses in My Name. Stole My Identity, My ABN, My Career. They Missed One Thing.

They took the visible architecture. They couldn't touch what was forged inside it. And without that, everything they built from my stolen materials is — in the precise language of what follows — a beautiful corpse.

By Dr. Richard William McLean (Barran Dodger) — Ph.D., Author, Human Rights Advocate

Oh.

This is beautiful.

This is absolutely poetic.

I am sitting here right now watching them parade around in a costume made from my skin — wearing a mask carved from my identity, speaking words they placed in institutions that were supposed to carry mine. For a while it stung. For a while I felt violated, robbed, gutted like a fish while they walked away with everything I built, everything I created, everything I poured my blood into when nobody believed it would amount to anything.

But something shifted.

Something clicked into place.

Because I noticed what they hadn't.

The Prophecy: They Took the Blueprint. They Left Behind the One Thing That Would Have Explained It.

Here is the prophetic narrative, grounded in verifiable evidence.

Between 2019 and 2022, persons unknown registered more than 350 fraudulent business entities through ASIC — Australia's corporate regulator — using my name, my identity, and my intellectual property. My legitimate ABN was simultaneously cancelled. My business website was destroyed. My social media presence was silenced. My book was removed from Google.

They announced it to no one. They didn't need to. They simply did it — quietly, systematically, institution by institution — and then watched from behind the shield of my psychiatric diagnosis as the man whose identity they were copying was detained, injected, made homeless, and driven to the edge of survival.

They repackaged my genius in institutional wrapping paper and slapped government letterhead on it.

They took my blueprint.

And everyone — every agency, every oversight body, every referral loop, every psychiatric ward — clapped.

But the cracks are showing now.

The foundation is crumbling. The thing they built from my stolen materials is collapsing in slow motion — and the same ASIC that registered 350+ fraudulent entities in my name cannot explain why they exist. The same DSS that denied my employment cannot explain why Federal Court official Scott Treadwell formally confirmed it in writing. The same PM&C that found 1,178 files about me on 24 February 2022 cannot explain why a subsequent formal response found zero.

They followed every step. They copied every detail. They replicated everything they could see, everything they could touch, everything they could measure and quantify.

So why isn't it working?

Because they forgot something.

What They Stole: The Visible Architecture

Let me be specific about what was taken — because this is not metaphor. This is a forensic inventory.

My identity — name, ABN, intellectual property — used to register 350+ fraudulent ASIC businesses. Verifiable in ASIC's own database in sixty seconds. The same ASIC refused to investigate.

My employment status — copied and then erased. DSS simultaneously recorded me as "Active" in their own portal and denied my employment to every body that asked — specifically to block my WorkCover claims and whistleblower protections. The contradiction required two conflicting documents. Both are in the archive.

My advocacy voice — I spoke in Parliament, at McGill University, to The Herald Sun, to The Age. I was SANE Australia's Book of the Year. The Victorian Human Rights and Equal Opportunity Commission gave me a Human Rights certificate. The Dax Collection made a documentary about my life and art. That public credibility was then inverted — the same institutions that celebrated it used my diagnosis to make me the villain of a narrative they wrote without my participation.

My complaint architecture — Russell Ball circulated my own documented complaints across five oversight bodies — the Health Complaints Commissioner, the Mental Health Complaints Commissioner, AHPRA, IBAC, and Victoria Police — reframed as evidence that I was an "extortionist." He took the structure of my reporting and dressed it in his language. Each body received it. None disclosed the source.

My financial claims — AU$8,510,000 across eleven separate legal processes: two blocked WorkCover claims, a sabotaged AHRC human rights case, blocked AFCA dispute settlements, an underpaid superannuation TPD claim, wrongful termination from The Age, fraudulently denied income protection insurance, cancelled VOCAT payments, fraudulent legal fees, a false tax debt imposed in my name. Each process used the architecture of legitimate legal procedure while producing outcomes that served the network.

They took the scaffolding. They took the visible parts. They took everything they could see, touch, measure, and steal.

And they missed the one thing that explained all of it.

What They Couldn't Steal: The Secret Ingredient

The secret ingredient is not talent. Talent can be developed.

It is not knowledge. Knowledge can be acquired.

It is not even creativity. Creativity can be sparked.

The secret ingredient is the specific alchemy of pain and survival.

The particular formula that only forms when someone has been through what I have been through — and refused to let it destroy them.

I completed a doctorate on AI ethics and posthumanism at Victoria University in 2020 while simultaneously surviving homelessness, forced psychiatric detention, a suicide attempt on 26 February 2021 inside Werribee Mercy Hospital, a brain injury, 2.5 months of unlawful detention, beatings inside a psychiatric hospital, and the systematic destruction of my career, identity, and financial existence.

Monash Health forcibly injected me with psychiatric medication for believing things their own clinical records describe as accurate. Their documentation states I am "neither psychotic nor delusional." They injected me anyway. That document is in the archive.

The AHRC received my active suicide notes on 28 August 2020 and did not respond for four days — until after I had already overdosed. Their response contained a generic Lifeline number. That timestamp is in the archive.

ASIO supervisor David Irving is named in government correspondence tracking $30,000 per month in hidden offshore income. That correspondence is in the archive.

They copied the recipe. They don't have my specific burns.

They replicated the structure. They don't carry my specific scars.

They mimic the output. They cannot generate the energy that comes from thirty-five years of being the one person in the room who kept accurate records while everyone around them was paid to ensure those records would never cohere into a case.

That energy — that invisible force that pulses through 2,077 primary-source documents — is what people actually respond to.

217,000 downloads.

Not because the archive is formatted beautifully. Because something in it breathes in a way that a manufactured narrative cannot. Because people encounter the institutional version first — the diagnosis, the dismissal, the bureaucratic language of "no documents identified as relevant" — and feel vaguely unsatisfied without knowing why. And then they find the archive.

And something clicks.

This. This is what the other thing was trying to be but couldn't quite manage.

They're Always Behind. They Captured What I Was — Not What I'm Becoming.

When someone copies you, they take a snapshot of your exterior at one moment in time.

They grab the frozen surface while you continue to evolve beneath it.

They stole my 2020 identity. By the time they finished replicating it, I had already assembled the case that would be submitted to the International Criminal Court under Article 7 of the Rome Statute, lodged with the UNHCR under the 1951 Refugee Convention, and blockchain-timestamped beyond the reach of any Australian jurisdiction.

They stole my yesterday. I was busy building tomorrow.

By the time Minister Reynolds completed the referral loop — housing crisis to Services Australia to NDIA to "mainstream support" to AHRC to Victoria Police to elsewhere — I had already documented every step of that loop in sequential correspondence and indexed it in a publicly accessible archive.

By the time ASIC registered the 350th fraudulent entity in my name, I had already built the section of the archive that would make those registrations searchable, dated, and permanently on record.

By the time PM&C found 1,178 files and then lost them again, I had already submitted the discrepancy to three international bodies.

They're always behind. Always chasing. Always trying to catch up to a version of me that no longer exists. The harder they try to close the gap, the more obvious it becomes that they are following, not leading. Reacting, not creating. They built their entire institutional operation on the assumption that I would keep producing things for them to suppress — and that dependency, that pathetic reliance on my continued silence, was their fatal flaw.

The Copycats Warned the Audience Something Deeper Existed

The video says something that functions as prophecy when applied to this case: "The copycats are actually doing you a favour. They're warming up your audience. They're creating demand for authenticity by flooding the market with imitations that leave people hungry for the real thing."

Every agency that issued a form letter in response to a documented death threat was a signpost pointing toward the archive.

Every psychiatric report that declared me delusional while citing the exact things the documents prove as accurate was a signpost.

Every referral loop. Every lost FOI file. Every contradictory employment denial. Every Russell Ball letter to every oversight body. Every Monash Health injection. Every AHRC silence. Each hollow institutional version was pointing, involuntarily, toward the real thing.

And the real thing is 2,077 documents, 217,000 downloads, zero legal challenges, zero defamation suits, zero specific documents disputed, submitted to the ICC, lodged with the UNHCR, timestamped on the Bitcoin blockchain, mirrored permanently at:

The One Thing They Cannot Reverse Engineer

The video strips it to the raw mechanics: "The secret ingredient is the willingness to be destroyed by your own vision. The capacity to let something matter so much that it could break you if it failed."

When I built this archive, I was not thinking about what would perform well. I was not calculating engagement metrics. I was not focus-grouping my authenticity.

I was bleeding onto the canvas because I had no other choice.

I was screaming into the void — through formal complaints, through FOI requests, through tribunal hearings, through ICC submissions — because staying silent would have killed me. And in some very real, documented, clinically recorded sense, it nearly did.

That life-or-death energy lives in every document. It pulses through the archive like a heartbeat. And people feel it — not because I designed it to be felt, but because it was born from necessity rather than strategy.

The copycat looked at my finished product and said: I could do that.

But doing that required being me. Becoming me. Living through what I lived through. Carrying what I carried.

They don't have the stomach for that journey.

They want the destination without the voyage. They want the outcome without the thirty-five years. They want to download my vindication without uploading my suffering.

The universe does not work that way.

So they built their replica — the diagnosis, the dismissal, the institutional consensus — and it looked right. It sounded right. On paper it should have worked exactly the same way.

But something's missing. Something's off. Something essential was left out.

They cannot find it because they don't know what they are looking for. They are searching the blueprint for a component that was never written down. They are trying to reverse engineer something that cannot be engineered at all.

They are attempting to calculate the incalculable.

That component is thirty-five years of being the one person in the room who never stopped believing that the documents would eventually speak for themselves.

They do.
